Financial disclosure reports may be viewed in the Article III Judges Division by appointment. Appointments must be made at least 5 working days in advance. Staff will provide the requester with a duplicate redacted copy of the filer's file. In no case will the original file be removed from the file room for review by a member of the public.

4.3 Cost.

Requesters will be charged $.20 per page to cover reproduction and mailing costs. A copy of the requested report may be furnished without charge or at a reduced charge if it is determined that waiver or reduction of the fee is in the public interest. Requests for waiver must be presented in writing to the Committee on Financial Disclosure.

4.4 Notification of a Request.

(a) The office of the Committee on Financial Disclosure will immediately notify the filer when an AO Form 10A is received requesting the release of the filer's financial disclosure reports and will provide each filer with a copy of the requester's AO-Form 10A.

(b) When a request involves a filer who is the subject of an ongoing criminal or ethics investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice or a committee of the Judicial Conference or a circuit judicial council, the Committee will not notify a filer of the release of a financial disclosure report where the originator of the request makes an affirmative request that the filer not be notified. The Committee staff will coordinate with the Chair on the release of reports in connection with such investigations.

5.0 Limitations on Release.

5.1 Incomplete or Improper Request.

Under section 105 of the Ethics in Government Act, financial disclosure reports will not be released to any individual who fails to properly complete the AO Form 10A or pay assessed costs.

5.2 Security.

(a) Committee staff will take every step to ensure the privacy and security of judges and judiciary employees required to file a financial disclosure report in accordance with the statute and the guidance provided by the Committee on Financial Disclosure. The reports will be maintained in a secure file room.

(b) The staff will not release or allow the viewing of any report until notice has been given to the filer, except as provided in § 4.4.

(c) In accordance with Committee direction, Committee staff will continue to monitor compliance with the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, as amended, while minimizing security risks by redacting information not required by the Act including without limitation:

(1) spouse's and dependents' names;

(2) home addresses;

(3) social security numbers;

(4) financial account and bank account numbers;

(5) street addresses of rental properties, financial institutions, and business properties;

(6) ownership codes; and

(7) filer's signature.

(d) A report that may be disseminated to the public after release to a requester may be redacted pursuant to Section 105 of the Act to prevent public disclosure of personal or sensitive information that could endanger the filer directly, or indirectly by endangering another, if possessed by a member of the public hostile to the filer. The procedure for determining whether redaction is appropriate shall be as follows:

(1) When an annual report is filed, the filer shall request redactions believed to be appropriate before release of a report that may be disseminated to the public. Requests for redaction may also be made after a filer receives a notification of a request under § 4.4.

(2) Reports that will not be considered as ones that may be disseminated to the public after release to a requester include but are not limited to:

(i) reports released upon request to appropriate committees of the Senate or House of Representatives;

(ii) reports released upon request to appropriate officials of the Executive Branch.

In the case of (i) and (ii), redaction of the filer's signature pursuant to § 5.2(c)(7) shall not occur if so indicated by the requester.

(3) The filer shall state with specificity what material is sought to be redacted. The filer shall also state in detail the reasons justifying redaction. These reasons may include, but are not limited to:

(i) the purposes and need for an ongoing protective detail provided by the United States Marshals Service;

(ii) particular threats or inappropriate communications;

(iii) involvement in a high threat trial or appeal; or

(iv) certain information on the form could endanger the filer directly or indirectly if possessed by a member of the public hostile to the filer.

(4) The Committee will determine, in consultation with the United States Marshals Service, whether information sought to be redacted could, if disseminated to the public, endanger the filer directly or indirectly and grant or deny the request accordingly. Information that could facilitate the financial harassment of a filer, such as identity theft, may be deemed information that could endanger a filer. However, no redaction will be granted that eliminates disclosure of the existence, rather than extent, of an interest in an entity that would disqualify the filer from serving as a judge in litigation involving that entity, unless disclosure of that interest would reveal the location of a residence of the filer or a family member, reveal the place of employment of the filer or a family member, or might increase an existing danger to a filer based on circumstances described in (d)(3)(i)-

(iii) of this Section. The Committee may redact material without a request from a filer if it has received credible evidence that the release of information contained in a financial report could endanger the filer.

(5) A filer aggrieved by a denial of a request for redaction may petition the Special Redaction Review Panel of the Judicial Conference of the United States for review within 10 days of notification of the denial. The Special Review Panel shall issue a determination promptly. The term of the Special Redaction Review panel shall expire on December 31, 2001.

(e) Information may be redacted from a report in accordance with such finding to the extent necessary to protect the judge or judiciary employee who filed the report, and the redactions will be made for as long as the reasons for redacting the report exist.

(f) The Committee staff will notify a filer when a report is actually released or reviewed and provide the filer with a copy of the released report with any redactions. The staff will maintain a copy of the redacted material for as long as the original report is maintained.

(g) A request for redaction and its supporting documents, except for copies of the financial disclosure report and any amendments thereto, are considered confidential and will only be used to determine whether to grant a request for redaction. Such documents are not considered to be a part of any report releasable under section 105(b)(1) of the Act.

6.0 Use of Reports.

(a) Section 105 of the Act provides that it is unlawful for any person to obtain or use a report:

(1) for any unlawful purpose;

(2) for any commercial purpose other than by news and communications media for dissemination to the general public;

(3) for determining or establishing the credit rating of any individual; or

(4) for use directly or indirectly, in the solicitation of money for any political, charitable, or other purpose.

(b) The Attorney General may bring a civil action against any person who obtains or uses a report for any purpose prohibited by this paragraph. The court in which such action is brought may assess against such person a penalty in any amount not to exceed $10,000. Such remedy may be in addition to any other remedy available under statutory or common law.

7.0 Reporting Requirements.

The Committee on Financial Disclosure will report to the Judicial Conference on an annual basis the following:

(a) the total number of reports in which required information is redacted under exercise of the authority delineated in paragraph 5.2(d);

(b) the total number of individuals whose reports have been redacted under exercise of the authority in paragraph 5.2(d); and

(c) the types of threats against filers whose reports are redacted, if appropriate.

The Conference will provide copies of the report to the Committees on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives and of the Senate.

Dear General Hood:

Thank you very much for allowing me to visit Guantanamo Bay last week. I was extraordinarily impressed. You and your colleagues have developed standards and imposed a degree of professionalism that the nation can be proud of, and being able to see first hand all that you have managed to accomplish with such a difficult and sensitive mission makes my job of helping explain and defend it before the courts all the easier.

Thank you again for taking so much time and trouble to make sure we received such a helpful and thorough briefing and tour.

On Detainees, a Victory for Bush

The troubled Bush administration won a rare victory this week. The Senate voted to close federal courts to Salim Gherebi, an enemy combatant imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay. He is suing the president and the defense secretary for $100 million in compensatory damages and $1 billion in punitive damages for violation of his rights under the Constitution. His is one of 174 lawsuits filed on behalf of terrorist detainees, none of them U.S. citizens, that have undermined the war against terrorism.

That outcome is indeed the purpose of lawsuits instigated by left-wing American lawyers. Court filings demanding high-speed Internet service, claiming medical malpractice and seeking DVDs fail to release many prisoners, but they do hamstring U.S. intelligence. The Senate's action this week keeps noncitizen aliens from using habeas corpus, invoked throughout the country's history to protect citizens from illegal imprisonment.

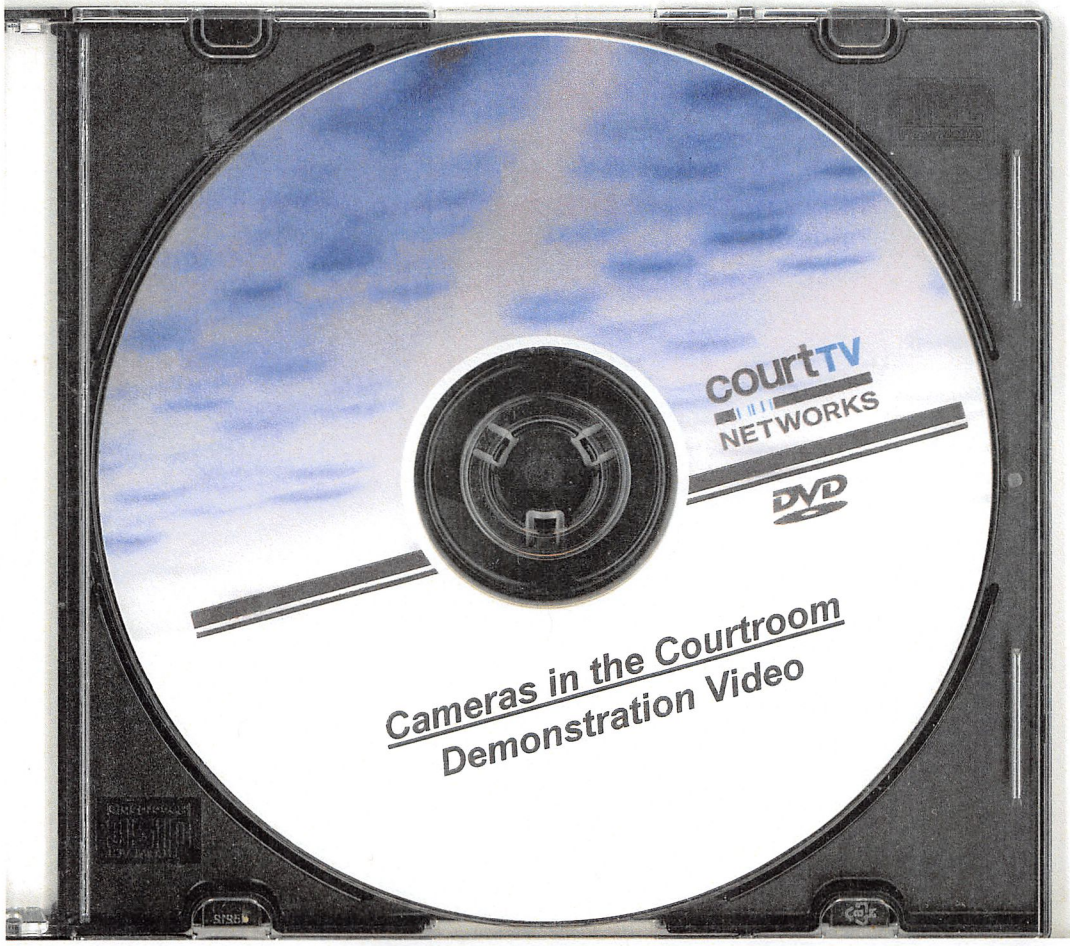
"Never in the history of the law of armed conflict," Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham told the Senate on Monday, "has a military prisoner, an enemy combatant, been granted access to any court system, federal or otherwise, to have a federal judge come in and start running the prison." Graham's proposal would suspend habeas corpus for the third time in American history, following Abraham Lincoln and Franklin D. Roosevelt. Remarkably, 44 Senators voted Tuesday to permit legal harassment by enemy combatants.

Graham's legislation countermanded a June 28, 2004, decision by the Supreme Court, which voted 6 to 3 to overturn a lower court ruling and open the federal court system to alien enemy combatants in the absence of specific congressional action. That produced cases such as one filed by Saifullah Paracha, who seeks an order to improve his mail delivery and medical treatment and to establish judicial review over "opportunities for exercise, communication, recreation, worship, etc." Other lawsuits call for judges to sit in on interrogation of prisoners.

The purpose behind this litigation was exposed this year by prominent leftist lawyer Michael Ratner in an interview with Mother Jones magazine. "The litigation is brutal," Ratner said of its impact on the U.S. military's work at Guantanamo Bay. "We have over one hundred lawyers now from big and small firms working to represent those detainees. Every time an attorney goes down there, it makes it much harder to do what they're doing."

Yet, nearly half the Senate voted to keep the courtroom door open to aliens captured on the battlefield. The Senate often tries to give the impression of consensus when there really is none, and that is the case with Graham's amendment to the Armed Services authorization bill. Perhaps intentionally, critics of the administration's war policy have confused this issue with torture of prisoners, which the Senate overwhelmingly condemned by adopting Sen. John McCain's separate amendment.

An effort by Democratic Sen. Jeff Bingaman to maintain habeas corpus access for enemy combatants was narrowly defeated, 49 to 42, last week, when Graham's amendment was adopted. The vote was largely along party lines, with only five Democrats and four Republicans crossing over.



After that vote, Democrats put out the word that Graham had worked with Democratic Sen. Carl Levin for a "compromise." The new version did give a limited right of appeal for enemy combatants sentenced to more than 10 years or given the death penalty, but the flood of nuisance litigation by prisoners would still end.

But when Bingaman's proposal came up again, Tuesday, it actually gained two votes, losing 54 to 44. Levin, co-sponsor of the "compromise," voted against Graham to continue habeas corpus access as he had the previous week.

Late on Monday, the day before the final vote on the issue, the need for the Graham amendment was underlined. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, a Clinton appointee with a reputation for judicial activism, blocked the trial by a U.S. military commission of a captured enemy combatant who was the first litigant of Ratner's Center for Constitutional Rights. David Hicks, an Australian, was accused of fighting alongside the Taliban in Afghanistan and charged with attempted murder and conspiracy to attack civilians and commit terrorism. Under Graham's amendment, this case could go only to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit after a conviction and sentencing decision by a military commission.

The Heritage Foundation Luncheon

Date: Wednesday, April 26, 2006, at 12:00 noon to 1:30 p.m.

Venue: The Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave., N.E. Washington, DC

Setting: Roundtable Discussion.

Audience: Approximately 15 Individuals -- Department Component Heads and Heritage Staff.

Purpose: The purpose of The Heritage Foundation luncheon is to provide a useful forum for a select gathering of senior political staff from the Department of Justice to discuss relevant policy areas of mutual concern—typically three issues over lunch.

Discussion: This is an informal and off-the-record lunch that will be hosted by Edwin Meese, the Reagan Distinguished Fellow Chairman of the Center for Legal and Judicial Studies; and Ginni Thomas, Director of Executive Branch Relations at The Heritage Foundation. The Deputy Attorney General has invited the appropriate senior-level Justice participants, and chosen the topics for discussion. This discussion will occur around the table during lunch.

Discussion Topics: Patriot Act (specifically Terrorism Prosecution/Civil Liberties issues that accompany the Act); Judicial confirmations; and Sentencing issues.

Department of Justice Attendees:

Paul J. McNulty, Deputy Attorney General
Bill Mercer, Principal Associate Deputy Attorney General
Michael Elston, Chief of Staff to the Deputy Attorney General
Robert McCallum, Associate Attorney General
Neil Gorsuch, Principal Deputy Associate Attorney General
Rachel Brand, Assistant Attorney General – Office of Legal Policy
William Moschella, Assistant Attorney General – Office of Legislative Affairs
Crystal Jezierski, Director, Office of Intergovernmental and Public Liaison
Mark Grider, Counsel to the Deputy Attorney General

The Heritage Foundation Attendees:

Ed Meese, Ronald Reagan Distinguished Fellow in Public Policy and Chairman, Center for Legal and Judicial Studies

Former U.S. Attorney General Edwin Meese was among President Ronald Reagan's most important advisors. As Chairman of the Domestic Policy Council and the National Drug Policy Board, and as a member of the National Security Council, he played a key role in the development and execution of domestic and foreign policy. During the 1970s, Mr. Meese was Director of the Center for Criminal Justice Policy and Management and Professor of Law at the University of San Diego. He earlier served as Chief of Staff for then-Governor Reagan and was a local prosecutor in California. Mr. Meese is a Distinguished Visiting Fellow at the Hoover Institution, Stanford University, and a Distinguished Senior Fellow at the Institute of United States Studies, University of London. He earned his B.A. from Yale University and his J.D. from the University of California, Berkeley.

Mike Franc, Vice President, Government Relations

A long-time veteran of Washington policymaking, Mike Franc oversees Heritage's outreach to members of the U.S. House and Senate and their staffs. From 1993 to 1996, he served as Heritage's Director of Congressional Relations. In 1996, he served as Director of Communications for House Majority Leader Richard Armey of Texas. Before joining Heritage, he served in the Office of National Drug Control Policy and as Legislative Counsel for then-Representative William Dannemeyer of California. A graduate of Yale University, Franc earned his J.D. from Georgetown University Law Center.

Ginni Thomas, Director, Executive Branch Relations

Virginia L. Thomas is director of executive branch relations at The Heritage Foundation. Previously, Thomas served as Heritage's senior fellow in government studies. Her work helped guide the implementation of the Government Performance and Results Act, which requires government agencies to define their missions and set performance goals so Congress can better carry out its oversight responsibilities. In her current position, Thomas works to advance Heritage's policy recommendations on a range of foreign and domestic issues among decision-makers in the executive branch.

Before coming to Heritage, Thomas handled oversight responsibilities for the House Majority Leader's Office. From 1993 to 1995, she was senior policy coordinator for the House Republican Conference. Prior to that she was deputy assistant secretary of labor and a labor counsel for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Thomas also served on the legislative staff of former Rep. Hal Daub, R-Neb. Thomas holds graduate and undergraduate degrees from Creighton University in her hometown of Omaha, Neb. She lives in Fairfax Station, Virginia.

Todd Gaziano, Director, Center for Legal and Judicial Studies

Todd Gaziano focuses on legal and judicial reform and such constitutional issues as ensuring that all citizens are accorded equal treatment under the law. Before joining former Attorney General Edwin Meese at The Heritage Foundation in 1997, Mr. Gaziano served under noted conservative leaders in all three branches of the federal government. He was Chief Counsel to the House Subcommittee on National Economic Growth, Natural Resources, and Regulatory Affairs, where he worked on government-wide regulatory reform legislation for Chairman David McIntosh. He served in the Office of Legal Counsel in the U.S. Justice Department, which provides advice on constitutional and legal issues to the President, the Attorney General, and other Cabinet Secretaries. He also served as a judicial law clerk to the Honorable Edith H. Jones, United States Judge for the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. Mr. Gaziano received his J.D. from the University of Chicago Law School, where he was selected as a John M. Olin Fellow in Law and Economics.

Brian Walsh, Senior Legal Research Fellow, Center for Legal and Judicial Studies (TENTATIVE)

Erica Little, Legal Policy Analyst, Center for Legal and Judicial Studies (TENTATIVE)

Erica graduated cum laude from UCLA with a Bachelor of Arts degree in history and political science. After graduation she was a Witherspoon Fellow at the Family Research Council. Erica is in her second year of law school at the George Mason University School of Law where she writes on the Federal Circuit Bar Journal. During the summer of 2005 Erica participated in the Blackstone Legal Fellowship program with the Alliance Defense Fund. Before coming to Heritage Erica spent a semester with the Senate Subcommittee on the Constitution, Civil Rights, and Property Rights, which is part of the Judiciary Committee and during which she worked on the confirmation hearings of Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito.

MORE THAN 30 CIVIL LIBERTIES PROTECTIONS IN THE USA PATRIOT ACT CONFERENCE REPORT

Notwithstanding a four-year track record with no verified civil liberties abuses, the current USA PATRIOT Act reauthorization bill adds more than 30 new significant civil liberties safeguards. These protections include:

- Four year sunsets on three provisions: section 206, which authorizes FISA multipoint ("roving") electronic surveillance; section 215, which amended the FISA business records provision; and the "lone wolf" provision from the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004.

- Significant new safeguards to section 215 court orders. Among other protections, the report requires high-level approval for requests for sensitive categories of records such as library records and medical records, clarifies the appropriate standard for obtaining such an order, and explicitly authorizes judicial challenges to any section 215 order.

- Additional safeguards on the use of multipoint electronic surveillance under FISA. Among other protections, the report requires increased specificity for applications for surveillance so that each application describes a single, unique target; clarifies that a judge granting surveillance must ensure in the order that the surveillance is authorized only for the target in the application; and requires investigators to inform the court within 10 days when "roving" surveillance authority is used to target a new facility—such as when a terrorist or spy changes to a new cellular service provider.

- Significant new safeguards for each of the National Security Letter (NSL) statutes. Among other protections, the report explicitly authorizes judicial challenges to NSLs, including the non-disclosure requirement accompanying the NSL, and adopts standard of review for non-disclosure that passed the Senate by unanimous consent.

- Additional reporting to Congress on the use of FISA authorities.

- A report to Congress on any use of data-mining programs by the Department of Justice.

USA PATRIOT Act: Successes in the Field

Section 201. Authority to Intercept Wire, Oral, and Electronic Communications Relating to Terrorism

- Justice Department investigators used a wiretap made possible by section 201 to investigate an Imperial Wizard of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan who attempted to purchase hand grenades for the purpose of bombing abortion clinics. He was subsequently convicted of numerous explosives and firearms charges.

Section 212. Authority for Internet Service Providers to Make Emergency Disclosures of Electronic Communications to Protect Life and Limb

- Section 212 assisted law enforcement in safely recovering an 88-year-old Wisconsin woman who was kidnapped and held for ransom while bound in an unheated shed during a cold Wisconsin winter. Investigators swiftly used section 212 and other USA PATRIOT Act authorities to gather information, including communications provided on an emergency basis from an internet service provider, that assisted in identifying several suspects and accomplices and then quickly located the elderly victim.

- This provision was also used to locate the Kansas woman who had strangled a pregnant Missouri woman and cut that woman's unborn daughter from her womb. Within twenty-four hours of the murder, the perpetrator was arrested and the baby was found alive.

Section 213: Delayed-Notice Search Warrants

- Section 213 was of tremendous value in Operation Candy Box, a multi-jurisdictional OCDETF investigation targeting a Canadian-based ecstasy and marijuana trafficking organization. In 2004, investigators learned that an automobile loaded with a large quantity of ecstasy would be crossing the U.S.-Canadian border en route to Florida. On March 5, 2004, after the suspect vehicle crossed into the United States near Buffalo, DEA agents followed the vehicle until the driver stopped at a restaurant just off the highway. Thereafter, one agent used a duplicate key to enter the vehicle and drive away while other agents spread broken glass in the parking space to create the impression that the vehicle had been stolen. A search of the vehicle revealed a hidden compartment containing 30,000 ecstasy tablets and ten pounds of high-potency marijuana. Because investigators were able to obtain a delayed-notification search warrant, the drugs were seized, the investigation was not jeopardized, and more than 130 individuals were later arrested on March 31, 2004, in a two-nation crackdown. To stop the drugs' distribution without a delayed-notification search warrant, agents would have been forced to reveal the existence of the investigation prematurely, which almost certainly would have resulted in the flight of many of the targets of the investigation.

Section 218. Foreign Intelligence Information ("Bringing Down the Wall")

- The removal of the "wall" separating intelligence and law enforcement personnel played a crucial role in the Department's successful dismantling of a terror cell in Portland, Oregon, popularly known as the "Portland Seven." Members of the cell had attempted to travel to Afghanistan in 2001–02 to take up arms with the Taliban and al Qaeda against U.S. and coalition forces fighting there. Through an undercover informant, law enforcement agents investigating that case learned from a cell member, Jeffrey Battle, that at least one member of the cell had contemplated attacking Jewish schools or synagogues and had even been casing such buildings to select a target for such an attack. By the time investigators received this information from the undercover informant, they had information that a number of other persons besides Battle had been involved in the Afghanistan conspiracy. But while several of these other individuals had returned to the United States from their unsuccessful attempts to reach Afghanistan, investigators did not yet have sufficient evidence to arrest them. Before the USA PATRIOT Act, prosecutors would have faced a dilemma in deciding whether to arrest Battle immediately. If prosecutors had failed to act, lives could have been lost through a terrorist attack. But if prosecutors had arrested Battle in order to prevent a potential attack, the other suspects in the investigation would have undoubtedly scattered or attempted to cover up their crimes. Because of section 218, however, it was clear that the FBI agents could keep prosecutors informed of what they were learning as the agents conducted FISA surveillance to determine whether the cell had received orders to reinstate the plan to attack Jewish targets. This gave prosecutors the confidence not to arrest Battle prematurely while they continued to gather evidence on the other members of the cell. Ultimately, prosecutors were able to collect sufficient evidence to charge seven defendants and then to secure convictions and prison sentences ranging from three to eighteen years for the six defendants taken into custody. Without section 218, this case likely would have been referred to as the "Portland One" rather than the Portland Seven.

- Prosecutors and investigators also used information shared pursuant to section 218 in investigating the defendants in the "Virginia Jihad" case. This prosecution involved members of the Dar al-Arqam Islamic Center who trained for jihad in Northern Virginia by participating in paintball and paramilitary training. Eight members traveled to terrorist training camps in Pakistan or Afghanistan between 1999 and 2001. These individuals are associates of a violent Islamic extremist group known as Lashkar-e-Taiba, which operates in Pakistan and Kashmir and has ties to the al Qaeda terrorist network. As the result of an investigation that included the use of information obtained through FISA, prosecutors were able to bring charges against these individuals. Six of the defendants pleaded guilty, and three were convicted in March 2004 of charges including conspiracy to levy war against the United States and conspiracy to provide material support to the Taliban. These nine defendants received sentences ranging from a prison term of four years to life imprisonment.

COUNTERTERRORISM SUCCESSES

Talking Points:

- Terrorists seek to destroy the American promise of liberty and prosperity for all people. Our highest priority is to stop them.

- The material support statutes are a cornerstone of the Department's prosecution efforts. Cutting off the provision of support and resources to foreign terrorist organizations is essential to preventing terrorist attacks. Bringing prosecutions under the material support statutes, such as 18 U.S.C. § 2339A (material support to terrorist activity) and 18 U.S.C. § 2339B (material support to a designated foreign terrorist organization), is a primary deterrent to the provision of money and other resources to terrorists. Recent successes in material support prosecutions include:

  o Abu Ali: On November 22, 2005, a federal jury convicted 24-year old Virginian Ahmed Omar Abu Ali on all counts, including conspiracy to provide and provision of material support to al-Qaeda and conspiracy to assassinate the President. Abu Ali faces a minimum sentence of 20 years and a maximum sentence of life imprisonment.

  o Paracha: On November 23, 2005, a federal jury convicted Pakistani Uzair Paracha of conspiring to provide and of providing material support to al-Qaeda. Evidence showed that Paracha, together with his father, tried to assist an al-Qaeda member's effort to enter the United States to commit a terrorist act. Paracha faces up to 75 years' imprisonment.

  o Lakhani: On April 27, 2005, a federal jury convicted Hemant Lakhani of attempting to provide material support to terrorists. Lakhani was arrested after an undercover sting, in which he attempted to sell shoulder-fired antiaircraft missiles to what he thought were members of a terrorist group. He was sentenced to 47 years' imprisonment.

  o Moussaoui: On April 22, 2005, Zacarias Moussaoui pleaded guilty to six charges related to his participation in the September 11, 2001 conspiracy. He could face the death penalty, and jury selection in the penalty phase trial began on February 13, 2006 in the Eastern District of Virginia.

  o Al-Timimi: On April 26, 2005, a federal jury convicted Ali al-Timimi, the spiritual leader of a Virginia mosque, on all charges related to the "Virginia Jihad" case. Al-Timimi encouraged other individuals to travel to Pakistan and receive military training from Lashkar-e-Taiba. He was sentenced to life in prison.

o Infocom: On April 13, 2005, a federal jury convicted the Texas-based Infocom Corp. and associated individuals of conspiracy to deal in the property of a specially designated terrorist. Infocom was believed to be acting as a front for Hamas.

o Al-Moayad and Zayed: On March 10, 2005, a federal jury convicted Mohammed Ali Hasan al-Moayad and Mohammed Zayed of conspiracy to provide and of providing material support to al-Qaeda and Hamas. Al-Moayad and Zayed were sentenced to 75 years and 45 years in prison, respectively.

o Dhafir: On February 10, 2005, a federal jury convicted Rafil Dhafir of conspiring to provide funds to Iraq in violation of U.S. sanctions. He was sentenced to 22 years' imprisonment.

o Lynn Stewart: On February 10, 2005, a jury convicted attorney Lynn Stewart and three others of providing material support to terrorists. The defendants were associates of Sheikh Abdul-Rahman, who is serving a life sentence for his role in terrorist activities, including the 1993 World Trade Center bombing. Stewart faces up to 20 years' imprisonment.

- Defendants who plead to such charges often cooperate and provide information to the government that can lead to the detection of other terrorism-related activity. Some examples of this approach include:

  o John Walker Lindh cooperated after pleading guilty to supporting the Taliban, in violation of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA) (50 U.S.C. § 1705(b)), in exchange for a 20-year prison sentence. Lindh provided information about training camps and fighting in Afghanistan in 2001.

  o Earnest James Ujaama cooperated in terrorism investigations after pleading guilty in April 2003 in Seattle to providing material support to the Taliban, in violation of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA) (50 U.S.C. § 1705(b)).

  o Six Buffalo "Cell" Defendants cooperated after pleading guilty to providing material support to al-Qaeda; five pleaded guilty to violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2339B) and one to violation of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA) (50 U.S.C. § 1705). They provided information about a pre-9/11 trip to the Al Qaeda affiliated al Farooq training camp in Afghanistan.

o In the Portland Cell case, four defendants agreed to cooperate after pleading guilty to various charges, including conspiracy to contribute services to al Qaeda and the Taliban, in violation of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA) (50 U.S.C. § 1705(b)), conspiracy to possess firearms in furtherance of a crime of violence (18 U.S.C. § 924(c), (o)), and money laundering (18 U.S.C. § 1956). The cooperation agreements from these four defendants were essential to obtaining guilty pleas from the final two defendants in custody and were vital to the investigation into those who provided support to the Portland Cell.

o In the Drugs-for-Stinger-Missiles case in San Diego, two defendants pleaded guilty to (1) conspiracy to distribute heroin and hashish (21 U.S.C. §§ 846, 841), and (2) providing material support and resources to al Qaeda (18 U.S.C. § 2339B), and they cooperated in the case against a third defendant.

- In addition, the Department's counterterrorism efforts have broadened since September 11 to include pursuit of offenses terrorists are likely to commit, such as identity theft and immigration violations.

  o Prosecution of terrorism-related targets on less serious charges is often an effective method – and sometimes the only available method – of deterring and disrupting potential terrorist planning and support activities. Some examples of this approach include:

  o Damrah: On June 17, 2004, a jury convicted Cleveland imam Fawaz Damrah of violating 18 U.S.C. § 1425 for concealing material facts in his citizenship application. Damrah had concealed his affiliation with terrorist-related groups, including Palestinian Islamic Jihad, and that he had incited, participated, or assisted in the persecution of others by advocating violent terrorist acts. He served his sentence and is awaiting deportation.

  o Biheiri: In two separate trials, Soliman Biheiri was convicted of violating 18 U.S.C. §§ 1425 and 1546 (fraudulently procuring a passport), as well as of making false statements to government investigators in violation of 18 U.S.C. §§ 1001 and 1015. Biheiri was the president of a New Jersey-based investment firm suspected of having links to terrorist financing schemes. He will be deported to Egypt after serving his term of imprisonment.

- The cooperation of State and local law enforcement is essential to prosecuting terrorism cases. The FBI, through its Joint Terrorism Task Forces (JTTFs), and the United States Attorneys' Offices, through their Anti-Terrorism Advisory Councils (ATACs), work together with other federal agencies and with State and local law enforcement agencies to coordinate efforts to identify, respond to, and disrupt terrorist threats.

Background:

- Statutes reaching traditional terrorist activity include 18 U.S.C. § 2332a (use of a weapon of mass destruction), 18 U.S.C. § 2332b (terrorist acts transcending national boundaries), and explosives offenses such as 18 U.S.C. § 924. Examples of such prosecutions include:

  o Moussaoui: Among the charges to which Zacarias Moussaoui pleaded guilty was conspiracy to violate 18 U.S.C. § 2332b for his role in the September 11 plot.

  o Rudolph: On April 13, 2005, Eric Rudolph pleaded guilty to violations of 18 U.S.C. §§ 844 and 924 following a series of bombings in Georgia and Alabama, including the 1996 Atlanta Summer Olympic Games bombing. He was sentenced to four consecutive terms of life imprisonment.

- The key material support statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2339B, became functional in 1997 after the Secretary of State's initial designation of 30 groups as foreign terrorist organizations (FTOs). Currently, there are 42 FTOs. Other frequently charged offenses used in material support-type cases include 18 U.S.C. § 956 (conspiracy to kill, kidnap, maim, or injure persons or damage property in a foreign country), 18 U.S.C. § 2339A (material support of terrorist activity), and 50 U.S.C. § 1705 (contribution of funds, goods, or services to or for the benefit of a specially designated terrorist).

- Statutes reaching related offenses that terrorists are likely to commit include 18 U.S.C. § 1546 (fraudulently obtaining travel documents), 18 U.S.C. § 1425 (immigration violations), and 18 U.S.C. § 1001 (making misrepresentations to federal investigators).

DOJ_NMG_0145076

JUDICIAL NOMINATIONS: Production of Government Documents

Talking Points:

- The Department of Justice has important institutional concerns regarding the release to Congress of internal privileged or deliberative memoranda. The Attorney General and other Department officials rely upon the frank, honest, and thorough advice from all attorneys. Such an exchange cannot take place if attorneys are worried that their advice is not confidential, but subject to public disclosure.

- In the context of confirmation hearings, there is limited precedent for the production of otherwise privileged memoranda. For the vast majority of judicial nominees with experience at the Department of Justice – even those with no prior judicial experience – the Senate never requested their confidential memoranda.

- While the decision is ultimately up to the Attorney General, I commit that if confirmed, I would work with the Senate to try to resolve specific issues of concern, as the Department has done in the past.

Background:

- The Senate Judiciary Committee Democrats requested that the Department of Justice turn over attorney work product, specifically appeal, certiorari, and amicus memoranda that John Roberts and Samuel Alito wrote as attorneys in the Office of the Solicitor General.

- The Department did not disclose deliberative memoranda in either of these nominations. The National Archives did release Solicitor General documents that were in the files of other DOJ officials that the Clinton Department of Justice had released to the Archives without document-by-document review or reservation of privileges..

ABA Talking Points:

- First, let me make clear that the Administration fully welcomes the ABA's involvement in the judicial nominations and confirmation processes. The Administration welcomes the ABA's suggestions regarding potential judicial candidates, as well as the ABA's evaluation of nominees' fitness for judicial service.

- The Administration came to the conclusion that the ABA alone -- out of the literally dozens of groups and many individuals who have a strong interest in the composition of the federal courts -- should not receive advance notice of the identities of potential nominees in order to render pre-nomination opinions on their fitness for judicial service.

- That kind of preferential arrangement was not fair to the many other groups that also have strong interests in judicial selection.

- We do believe, however, once the President submits a nomination to the Senate, the ABA, like every other interested party, should be free to evaluate and express its views concerning the President's nominee.

- The Administration's decision to treat the ABA in the same manner as all other interested parties mirrors the approach taken in recent decades by Presidents of both parties with respect to Supreme Court nominees, as well as the approach taken by the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1997 when it ended the ABA's quasi-official role in the Senate confirmation process.

Background:

- Several of the Democratic members of the Committee objected when the Bush Administration removed the ABA from its role of pre-nomination review of judicial candidates.

SENTENCING

Sentencing Reform

Talking Points:

- The Department remains committed to the core principles underlying the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 and the Federal Sentencing Guidelines that resulted from the Act - fair, tough, uniform, predictable and proportionate sentences. Consistency and fairness in sentencing are important; a defendant's sentence should not depend on the which judge happens to preside over the case

- After passage of the PROTECT Act in 2003, there was a marked increase of the percentage of sentences imposed within the ranges set by the Federal Sentencing Guidelines. The Sentencing Commission's recent report on the impact of Booker demonstrates that the impact of that legislation has been erased. Advisory guidelines have led to increased disparity and fewer sentences within the guidelines range. The rate of departures in cases involving sexual exploitation of minors and career offenders has increased significantly, and illegitimate factors – such as a defendant's race – appear to be having a greater influence on the sentence imposed now than before Booker.

- The Department has proposed legislation that would restore the protections and principles of the Sentencing Reform Act in a manner consistent with the requirements of the Sixth Amendment as set forth in Booker. Under such a system, the sentencing court would be bound by the guidelines minimum, just as it was before the Booker decision. The guidelines maximum would remain advisory, and the court would be bound to consider it, but not bound to adhere to it.

Background:

- The Federal Sentencing Guidelines are authorized by the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, developed the Sentencing Commission, and went into effect in 1987. The Supreme Court upheld the Act and Guidelines in 1989 in Mistretta v. United States.

- In United States v. Booker (January 12, 2005), the Supreme Court held that judicial fact-finding pursuant to the Guidelines violated defendant's Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial, and remedied the problem by rendering the Guidelines advisory. Thus courts are no longer bound to follow the Guidelines, but "must consult those Guidelines and take them into account when sentencing." The Court also established a new standard of review – "reasonableness" – for sentences on appeal.

- In a June 2005 speech, you said that the minimum guideline system is a possible legislative response to Booker that deserves serious consideration. This address was followed by a July 2005 speech by the Deputy Attorney General who expressed DOJ's strong interest in a minimum guidelines system as a legislative response to Booker.

- Last month, Bill Mercer testified before a House subcommittee and outlined the Department's legislative proposal. Chairman Sensenbrenner has indicated that he will push reform legislation in the House.

Mandatory Minimum Sentences

Issue: Don't you agree that mandatory minimum sentences often result in excessive penalties that are insufficiently tailored to the individual circumstances of an offense?

Talking Points:

- For almost 20 years, the Department and Congress – during Republican and Democratic Administrations alike – have consistently supported mandatory minimum sentences for serious offenses and offenders. These offenders include sexual predators of children, drug traffickers, and those who use firearms to commit violent and drug crimes.

- During this same time period, crime rates – for violent and property crimes – have dropped to their lowest levels since 1973.

- While the Department supports mandatory minimum sentences for the most serious crimes, it also supports limited exceptions to these laws. Specifically, the Administration supports the so-called "safety valve" exemption from mandatory minimum sentences. It also supports departure motions for defendants who cooperate with the Government by providing substantial assistance.

Background:

- In 1986, Congress passed the Anti-Drug Abuse Act that created the basic framework for mandatory minimums for drug traffickers. Since then, Congress has created other mandatory minimum sentences such as a mandatory life sentence for offenders convicted of a third serious violent felony (18 U.S.C. § 3559(c)), and mandatory minimum sentences for certain firearm offenses and methamphetamine offenders.

- For example, in 2003, Congress passed the PROTECT Act, which established or increased mandatory minimum sentences for those who sexually exploit children by producing and trafficking in child pornography or by commercially promoting sex with a minor.

The Heritage Foundation
LEADERSHIP FOR AMERICA

February 9, 2006

The President
The White House
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Mr. President:

Five years ago, the nation entered a new and unexpected chapter of its history. After the 9/11 attacks, The Heritage Foundation – like most Americans and the U.S. Government – turned its focus to improving homeland security and national defense. Much has been done over the last five years. We believe it is time to measure the progress and assess how far the nation has come.

The Heritage Foundation has a new initiative to do just that. With widespread input and a series of public forums, we are launching a 2006 National Security Report Card project. The goal of this project is to assess the efforts of the Administration, U.S. House of Representatives, and U.S. Senate since 9/11 to fill legislative holes in our security blanket, reform the bureaucratic structures and policies that hampered homeland security, and stimulate an efficient federal, state, and local partnership in the effort to make our nation safer.

We hope this initiative will produce a blueprint to help guide national security policy in the future, ensuring that America has the ways and means to win the Global War on Terrorism and meet emerging national security challenges.

Since 9/11, policymakers have made the most substantive and sweeping policy changes since President Truman signed the National Security Act of 1947. Three major pieces of legislation—the USA Patriot Act (signed on October 26, 2001), the Homeland Security Act (signed November 25, 2002), and the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act (signed on December 17, 2004) —initiated comprehensive reforms to refocus and revitalize all aspects of fighting the war on terrorism.

How have these changes helped improve homeland security? That is the question we will pose to evaluate the efforts of the Federal Government thus far.

In September 2006, prior to the Fifth Anniversary of 9/11, we will issue our report card, assigning letter grades for the efforts of the Administration, the House, and the Senate in seven core areas:

1. Civil Liberties—protecting the civil liberties of our citizens
2. Homeland Defense—providing for U.S. security both at home and abroad
3. Guns and Butter—ensuring the changes are not hamstringing our economy
4. Winning the War of Ideas—conducting public diplomacy
5. Comprehensive Immigration and Border Security Reform—controlling our borders
6. Intelligence Reform—providing effective, proactive intelligence
7. Medical Response to Catastrophic Disasters—organizing a national response

We anticipate using five criteria to grade each of these areas: including, how well they ensure that U.S. national security policy addresses future threats, boosts cost effectiveness, employs all elements of national power, respects federalism and other Constitutional principles, and promotes U.S. competitiveness in the global economy.

To complement our efforts to grade the nation's progress in homeland security, and to foster public discussion of each of the seven core areas listed above, The Heritage Foundation will be hosting monthly forums. At each event, we will ask two national security experts to address an issue, field questions from two Heritage analysts, and take questions from the audience. We will post a summary of the discussion on our website.

The first forum will take place on Friday, February 10th at 11:00 a.m. at The Heritage Foundation. Heather MacDonald of the Manhattan Institute and Timothy Edgar of the American Civil Liberties Union have agreed to address the issue of "Protecting Civil Liberties." We cordially invite you to send appropriate staff to this and any of the public events in this series.

I remain hopeful that this initiative will help advance public recognition of the significant efforts made thus far and move the discussion forward on what is still needed to win the war on terrorism. Should you have any questions, feel free to contact me or our Director of Executive Branch Relations, Ginni Thomas, at (202) 608-6240.

Faithfully,

Edwin J. Feulner, Ph.D.
President

THE HERITAGE FOUNDATION'S NATIONAL SECURITY REPORT CARD: THE SEVEN ESSENTIAL COMPONENTS

#1 Protecting Civil Liberties

Protecting the civil liberties of our citizens

National security cannot impermissibly infringe on civil liberties. Have security measures, such as the passage of the Patriot Act and subsequent changes, been made with the future in mind? If a change is made, it must be strategic for the long term. Policy for future technologies and capabilities for detecting, pursuing, and detaining terrorists must be considered. In the quest to win the global war on terrorism, has the government unintentionally or unnecessarily infringed upon civil liberties? Have other means to these ends been considered? Is there appropriate and adequate oversight? Have the House, Senate, and Administration effectively secured our liberty by safeguarding the conditions of true liberty?

#2 Defending the Homeland

Providing for U.S. security both at home and abroad

We need to take the "Eisenhower" approach to defending the homeland: build an enduring security system that is prepared for the long war and takes reasonable measures to protect Americans. The alternative is to do things that create the image of progress, without any real sense of whether such measures actually help stop terrorists. Did the laws passed and changes made to the government homeland security structure and response efforts since the 9/11 attacks create a solid strategy to protect our homeland, from both without and within our borders, or just create an illusion? Have the House, Senate, and Administration taken steps to streamline and enhance policy — from state and local government grant programs to the defense budget?

#3 Guns and Butter

Facilitating economic growth

Successful national security requires a strong economy — not principally to boost spending for defense or homeland security programs but rather to protect the American way of life. The U.S. economy is strongest when its capital is in the hands of citizens, not the government. Does our national security policy promote free trade, avoid taking unnecessary protectionist measures, and spend taxpayer dollars wisely? Reforming tax policy, taking government entitlements off automatic pilot, and amending the Congressional budget process to close holes that allow for massive and misdirected spending, will facilitate economic growth. Have the House, Senate, and Administration effectively made these reforms?

002/13/06 MON 01:40 FAX 006

#4 Winning the War of Ideas
Conducting Public Diplomacy

Securing the United States means winning the war of ideas by convincing our enemies that their defeat is inevitable, destroying the legitimacy of their corrupt ideologies, and depriving them of their supporters. Does U.S. national security policy enhance understanding of our enemies and successfully de-legitimize their view of the world? Most importantly, does the U.S. offer a credible alternative? Have the House, Senate, and Administration enacted changes in policy that effectively use the nation's influence with its allies and friends to convince them that terrorism is unacceptable? Have they promoted and supported democracy, enlisted the help of the international community to focus on areas most at risk for terrorism or what breeds terrorism, and promoted the free flow of ideas? Have they gotten the message of American values out to the world?

#5 Comprehensive Immigration and Border Security Reform
Controlling our borders

The 9/11 attacks demonstrated the dangers of a broken immigration and border security system. National security policy changes since then should reflect improvements in strategy to protect air, land, and maritime borders though policies based on risk assessment. An integral component to border security is successfully processing people entering the borders. Over 11 million illegal immigrants, some of them criminals and terrorists, are currently inside our borders. This broken system also endangers national identity. Comprehensive immigration and border security reform means creating a strategy to secure U.S. borders, repairing a damaged visa policy system, protecting and enhancing understanding of U.S. national identity based on Constitutional principles, and working with international partners to encourage freedom and prosperity in the homelands of immigrants. Have the House, Senate, and Administration taken a comprehensive and systematic approach to border security?

#6 Intelligence Reform
Providing effective, proactive intelligence

Strong national security policy is buttressed by an intelligence network that will be able to face the challenges of the 21st century. The U.S. needs intelligence agencies that are as facile in dealing with shadowy transnational gangs as they are in countering conventional enemies. Has the intelligence community recovered from the overwrought state it found itself on 9/11? Is the intelligence community funded adequately and structured appropriately to perform its mission? Has it rebuilt its human capabilities to collect and analyze intelligence, as well as exploit cutting-edge technologies to gather, distribute, and evaluate information? Have the House, Senate, and Administration taken all appropriate steps to facilitate better counterintelligence?

FIVE CRITERIA FOR GRADING THE SEVEN COMPONENTS OF NATIONAL SECURITY

#1 Address Current and Future Threats

Policies, strategies and operations must employ the right tools for the right war. In the 21st century, this includes making sure the military is trained and ready, can effectively conduct current operations, and can transform to deal with evolving threats; and adapting more effective organization and resourcing for the reserve components so that they can perform both homeland defense and post-conflict missions. For homeland security, this includes establishing risk-based measures, providing layered defenses, and having the ability to adapt to meet new threats.

#2 Be Cost-Effective

America must invest sufficiently and consistently on defense and homeland security in a manner that gives Americans the biggest "bang" for their security bucks. Federal investments must produce results. Organizations, programs, and operations must be set up and managed to be most efficient and effective as possible.

#3 Employ All Elements of National Power

The United States must effectively employ all its military, political, diplomatic, economic, and informational instruments in concert. Policies, strategies, and operations must seek and utilize the support of America's friends and allies and build strong, enduring international partnerships, while maintaining and respecting the sovereignty of individual states.

#4 Respect Federalism and Other Constitutional Principles

National policies must enable local, state, and federal government entities to work well together. Each level of government should be able to fulfill its appropriate responsibilities and ensure programs and policies respect jurisdictions, utilize available resources, and have established procedures for "who is in charge" during catastrophic events.

#5 Promote U.S. Competitiveness in the Global Economy

National policies and programs must enhance America's ability to compete in international markets. This includes avoiding protectionism in the quest for security, enabling our allies to meet security standards for trade and immigration, and keeping our military competitiveness by utilizing equipment suppliers in cooperative nations around the world.

The Honorable Alberto R. Gonzales
Attorney General of the United States
U.S. Department of Justice

Dear General Gonzales:

We are writing to advise you of our genuine concern with the manner in which the Office of Justice Programs (OJP) and the Bureau of Justice Assistance (BJA) have proposed to implement several of the new statutory provisions of the Public Safety Officers Benefit (PSOB) Act, and with the changes it has proposed to the current regulations governing the program.

Specifically, we are concerned that the regulations as proposed will require claimants to obtain legal counsel in order to navigate each stage of the PSOB process; have a negative impact on existing case law; repeal or greatly restrict certain important provisions of the current regulations which have been at issue in a number of other PSOB court cases; define the term "terrorist attack" for the purpose of providing expedited PSOB benefits in a manner contrary to both the intent and spirit of the law which was passed in the wake of the terrorist attacks on the United States in September 2001; and define key terms for the purposes of determining eligibility under the Hometown Heroes Survivors Benefits Act of 2003 (HHSBA) in a manner inconsistent with the Act. We are particularly troubled with the impact the proposed regulations might have on the HHSBA, as they seem to interpret the rebuttable presumption created by the Act as not being a rebuttable presumption at all, which does not conform with either the spirit of the law or the intent of Congress.

In our view, the proposed changes make the PSOB less user-friendly and less accessible to the families of public safety officers who have lost their lives in the line of duty. This is extremely unfortunate, as this program means a great deal to the public safety community, and we strongly recommend that their comments on the proposed regulations be reflected in the final rule.

On behalf of our colleagues, we thank you for your continued good work at the U.S. Department of Justice and look forward to the new PSOB regulations with the hope that they will accurately reflect the intent of Congress and benefit the families of our nation's fallen heroes.

Re: Travis County Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault Survival Center's Application for a FY 2006 Education and Technical Assistance Grant to End Violence Against Women with Disabilities

Dear Ms. Stuart:

I write in strong support of the concept paper submitted by the Travis County Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault Survival Center (d/b/a SafePlace), of Austin, Texas, to the Office on Violence Against Women (OVW) for the FY 2006 Education and Technical Assistance Grants to End Violence Against Women with Disabilities program. For over three decades, SafePlace has provided not only high-quality services to victims of rape, sexual abuse, and domestic violence, but also valuable prevention, education, and training services to help communities address and prevent these devastating crimes.

SafePlace would serve as the lead agency for this project and will be partnering with two disability services agencies, Advocacy, Inc., and Deaf Abused Women and Children Advocacy Services. Together, these three agencies will develop and conduct a statewide community needs assessment to gather data on the needs of Texans with disabilities who have experienced domestic and sexual violence. Based on the results, the agencies will develop and implement a strategic plan to address these needs, including offering statewide training and technical assistance activities.

As you know, persons with disabilities are among the populations at highest risk of experiencing domestic and sexual violence and related crimes. SafePlace and its partner agencies have extensive experience in addressing the needs of abuse survivors with disabilities, and I fully support their efforts.

Thank you for your consideration of this letter of support. I appreciate your full and fair consideration of this worthy proposal. If you should have any questions about this proposal or my support for it, please contact me at 202-225-4865. Please notify me as soon as possible of your funding decision (by phone or fax, 202-225-3073).

Sincerely,

Lloyd Doggett

Dear Attorney General Gonzales:

The Office of the Sheriff of Prince George's County recently submitted an application requesting funding under the Safe Havens: Supervised Visitation and Safe Exchange Program to establish and implement a fully functioning, collaborative based, comprehensive supervised visitation and safe exchange center within the administrative section of the Sheriff's office. I am writing to urge your favorable consideration of this application.

The Sheriff's Office's immediate objective is to increase the supervised visitation and safe exchange services available to the citizens of Prince George's County by providing a secure location where professionally trained staff are committed to promoting the safety of children and parents involved in domestic violence, stalking or sexual assault situations.

If funded, the Sheriff's Office will partner with the Family Crisis Center, Incorporated, the Sexual Assault Center and Child Protective Services to establish this collaborative program, employ and comprehensively cross train profession staff, provide a welcoming, non-threatening atmosphere for children suffering the stress and trauma of exchange or visitation, provide parenting classes and parent support groups, as well as provide essential data to the Courts, victim service agencies, coalitions, and the U.S. Department of Justice.

I hope you will give this application every favorable review and I look forward to your response.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

Paul Sarbanes

Dear Mr. Peed:

The Antrim Police Department in Antrim, New Hampshire, has submitted a grant application to you for a School Resource Officer under the "COPS in Schools" initiative. This is the first such effort by the Antrim Police Department. They are seeking a three year grant totaling $125,000. They plan to use this money to add an additional full-time police officer who would be assigned to the position of School Resource Officer. Among other things, this officer would have permanent assignment at the schools, provide DARE instruction, be involved in conflict resolution, intervene with at-risk juveniles, and be active in gang intervention. I ask that you give this application every consideration during the process.

Thank you in advance for your attention to this matter.

Dear Ms. Schofield:

I write to express my support for the application submitted by Legal Aid of the Bluegrass for funding under the Legal Assistance for Victims grant program (CFDA #16.524).

In 2004, Legal Aid of the Bluegrass (LABG) initiated a comprehensive civil legal services project with funding from the Office of Justice Programs. Through this program, over 250 victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, and stalking have received legal representation in areas of family, consumer, housing, and immigration law. The project serves 27 central and eastern Kentucky counties that either have highly rural or large non-English speaking populations. Several of the staffs involved in the project are bilingual, which helps to overcome language barriers many victims face in accessing and understanding the legal system. Attorneys also provide counseling about safety and emergency protective procedures to those clients who choose not to pursue legal remedies.

Legal Aid of the Bluegrass, in partnership with the Women's Crisis Center in northern Kentucky and the Bluegrass Rape Crisis Center in central Kentucky, seeks funds to continue and expand this program. More specifically, LABG would like to increase outreach efforts, streamline intake procedures, and focus on emergency issues. The partners will coordinate case management, transportation, benefits application, translation, and emergency shelter services so that victims are provided assistance seamlessly. In short, securing funding for this initiative will allow LABG to provide emergency and legal services to those most in need. I hope you will realize the importance of this project to Kentucky and give appropriate consideration to the application.

Thank you for your time and attention to this matter.

Sincerely,

Dear Ms. Stuart:

I write in reference to the grant application submitted by Community Legal Aid Services, Inc., for funding in the Legal Assistance for Victims Grant Program.

Community Legal Aid Services, Inc., a non-profit law firm that serves low-income populations located in Akron, seeks funding to provide comprehensive legal services to victims of violence and abuse. Community Legal Aid plans to add five staff members dedicated to providing comprehensive legal services to victims as well as coordinate trainings on domestic violence throughout its eight-county region. Funding will enable Community Legal Aid to provide effective legal services to low-income populations who otherwise could not afford legal representation.

Please give all due consideration to this request. If there are any questions, please contact my grants coordinator, Linda Greenwood at (419) 259-3895. Thank you.

Dear Ms. Stuart:

I am writing in support of the Northwest Justice Project's application for continuing funding through the Department of Justice, Violence Against Women office. This funding will support Northwest Justice Project's (NJP's) Domestic Violence Community Legal Project.

In collaboration with Consejo Counseling and Referral Services ("Consejo") and the Refugee Women's Alliance ("ReWa"), NJP's project seeks to provide civil legal services to battered immigrant women in King County, Washington. Originally created in 2001 with OVW funding, the project provides a unified source of legal information and representation to battered immigrant women in the greater Seattle area. The project will address problems of language and cultural barriers, isolation, and lack of culturally appropriate services, commonly faced by immigrant women experiencing family violence. By targeting this client population, NJP is addressing the critical issue of reducing barriers which prevent immigrant victims from accessing legal services.

As a strong supporter of the reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act, I believe that programs funded under the Violence Against Women Office are crucial to our community's efforts to advocate for domestic violence victims. I am pleased to offer my continuing support for the Northwest Justice Project's Domestic Violence Community Legal Project.

Dear Mr. President:

We urge you to fund the C.O.P.S. program at its fully authorized level of $1 billion in FY 2007.

Earlier this month, you signed the Violence Against Women and Department of Justice Reauthorization Act of 2005 into law, reauthorizing the C.O.P.S. program at $1,047,119,000 a year through 2009, and empowering the Department of Justice to award grants for state and local police departments to hire "terrorism cops."

The C.O.P.S. program has proven to be an integral part of the nationwide efforts to combat crime and prevent terrorism. To date, the program has helped local communities across the nation hire almost 120,000 additional police officers and acquire the equipment and technology they need to keep our streets safe.

Former Attorney General John Ashcroft has described C.O.P.S. as a "miraculous sort of success." And a GAO study released last year stated, "...we estimated that C.O.P.S.-funded increases in sworn officers per capita were associated with declines in the rates of total index crimes, violent crimes, and property crimes."

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Re: Travis County Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault Survival Center's Application for a Fiscal Year 2006 Legal Assistance for Victims Grant

Dear Ms. Stuart:

I am pleased to submit this letter of support for the Fiscal Year (FY) 2006 Legal Assistance for Victims (LAV) grant application submitted by the Travis County Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault Survival Center (d/b/a SafePlace) to your office. For 32 years, SafePlace, located in Austin, Texas, has provided innovative and effective services to women, children, and men affected by rape, sexual abuse, and domestic violence. The organization also offers education, prevention, training, and related services to assist in addressing and preventing these crimes.

SafePlace is the lead agency for the Civil Legal Assistance (CLA) program, the collaborative project for which LAV funds are requested. The other partners in the program demonstrate the broad community support for the good work of SafePlace and the goals of the LAV program: the Women's Advocacy Project, Inc.; University of Texas School of Law Domestic Violence Clinic; Volunteer Legal Services of Central Texas; Political Asylum Project of Austin; and Catholic Charities of Central Texas Office of Immigrant Concerns.

In the CLA program, SafePlace and its partners use a coordinated, streamlined system to refer domestic and sexual violence victims to the most appropriate partner agency for legal services. The program also provides training and education to increase the number of volunteer attorneys and social service providers to help them better assist victims of violence with civil legal issues. Legal services are critical to the safety and well-being of people whose lives are at risk due to sexual and domestic violence. The CLA program has served victims of violence in Travis County with funding from the Office of Violence Against Women since 1999, and if FY 2006 LAV funding is awarded, CLA will expand its services to also include neighboring, rural Williamson County.

I appreciate your full and fair consideration of SafePlace's LAV grant application. Should you have any questions about this invaluable program or my support for it, please contact me. Additionally, I would like to be advised of your funding decision via phone (202-225-4865) or fax (202-225-3073).

Sincerely,

Lloyd Doggett

Diane Stuart, Director

Washington, D.C. 20530

Dear Director Stuart:

I am writing in strong support of the grant application submitted to the Department of Justice by Crichton College for $399,889 over two years under the Grants to Reduce Violent Crimes Against Women on Campus.

The requested funding will assist the efforts of the Memphis Safe Campus Consortium (MSCC), a diverse group of four institutions of higher education dedicated to making the lives of their students safer and more fulfilling. The four urban institutions, whose enrollments include a majority population of female students and a high percentage of minority and underserved populations, include:

- Crichton College – a private, four-year, coeducational, Christian, liberal arts college.
- Rhodes College – a private, four-year, coeducational liberal arts college.
- Christian Brothers University – a private, Catholic, co-educational university.
- The University of Memphis – a public, comprehensive, metropolitan university.

Collaborating with the MSCC are the Memphis Crime Commission, the Memphis Police Department, the Shelby County Crime Victims Center, the Memphis Sexual Assault Resource Center, the Family Exchange Center, and the Crisis Center.

With the funding, the consortium partners will adopt a comprehensive program aimed at reducing violence against women on Memphis campuses. The program will include:

- on-going violence reduction programming;
- mandatory prevention and education programs about violence against women during student orientation;

- development of a training curriculum for campus safety officers with the assistance of the Memphis Police Department to effectively respond to dating violence, domestic violence, sexual assault, and stalking cases;
- development of a curriculum to train campus disciplinary boards on the means to respond effectively to charges of violence against women; and
- expansion of victims' services on campuses and in the community by promoting access to a 24-hour crisis response hotline service.

Without a safe, comforting and comfortable environment, our colleges and universities cannot accomplish their mission of educating the leaders of tomorrow. I am encouraged by the initiative shown by the MSCC to confront the serious problem of violence against women on campuses, and I enthusiastically support this funding request.

I thank you in advance for your consideration. If there is any way I can be of further assistance, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Sincerely,

HAROLD FORD, JR.

RE: National Youth Court Month, September 2006

Dear President Bush:

As Executive Director of the American Probation and Parole Association, which through a cooperative agreement with the Council of State Governments administers the National Youth Court Center (NYCC), I am writing six weeks prior to the print deadline of the National Youth Court Month Action Kit to request a Presidential Message recognizing September 2006 as National Youth Court Month. The National Youth Court Center is funded by a current initiative of the U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP), with additional funds from the U.S. Department of Transportation, National Highway and Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA); and the U.S. Department of Education, Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools.

Youth courts (also known as teen courts, peer courts and student courts) are one of the fastest growing crime intervention programs in the nation in which youth sentence their peers for minor delinquent and status offenses and problem behavior. Youth courts offer ways to engage the community in a partnership with the juvenile justice system to respond to juvenile crime and problem behavior. They can increase the awareness of delinquency issues on a local level and can mobilize community members and youth to take an active civic role in addressing the problem.

Not only are youth courts based on a philosophy of being youth-driven and youth-led, they also provide an excellent example of youth who are answering the call to public service as requested by President Bush. All youth involved in the close to 1,070 youth courts across the nation are volunteers. The theme selected for 2006 National Youth Court month is "Correcting Crooked Paths: Youth and Communities in Partnership for Justice." During September 2006, youth will be planning community service projects and events to recognize the contributions youth courts make to our communities and to celebrate the accomplishments of thousands of youth court volunteers, defendants, and staff.

If possible, I would like to have the Presidential Message by March 15, 2006 in order to place a copy of it in our National Youth Court Month Action Kit. If we do not receive the message by our print deadline for the Action Kit, then we would like to be able to send a copy of the message to the individuals in the National Youth Court Center's database (which includes active youth courts, programs in development stage, and other persons interested in the youth court concept) at the beginning of National Youth Court Month in September.

A greeting similar to the Presidential Greeting issued in the past for the National Youth Court Month would be greatly appreciated. If this office can be of further assistance, please feel free to contact me at (859) 244-8216, or contact the Project Director for the National Youth Court Center, Tracy Godwin Mullins at 859-244-8215 or via email at tmullins@csg.org.

Please mail the Presidential Message to:

January 2006

Dear Colleagues and Friends:

The Office for Victims of Crime (OVC) is pleased to provide you with the 2006 National Crime Victims' Rights Week Resource Guide. This year's commemoration is scheduled for April 23 to 29, 2006.

This year's theme—"Victims' Rights: Strength in Unity"—pays tribute to crime victims and survivors who, for many decades, have joined together in mutual support and advocacy to promote victims' rights and services. It also recognizes the ongoing efforts of countless victim service providers, justice professionals, and allied professionals and volunteers who selflessly dedicate their lives to helping victims of crime.

OVC's theme—"Putting Victims First"—is highlighted throughout the many components of the Resource Guide. Only when we work together to "put victims first" will we be successful in ensuring that any victim who needs assistance will receive it, and that any victim who needs help in exercising his or her rights will find guidance and support. This means engaging the support from your entire community, including justice professionals, civic leaders, interfaith communities, medical and mental health professionals, schools, and business leaders, among others.

Please take time to review this Resource Guide in its entirety so you can ensure maximum use of its many valuable victim and public awareness resources. It is also helpful to coordinate your efforts with crime victims and survivors, victim service providers, and justice and allied professionals in your community and state to commemorate 2006 National Crime Victims' Rights Week and truly promote "strength in unity."

I would also like to invite you to join our wonderful national-level activities to commemorate National Crime Victims' Rights Week in our Nation's capital. The 4th Annual National Observance and Candlelight Ceremony will be held on the evening of Thursday, April 20th, and the National Crime Victims' Rights Week Awards Ceremony will be held on the afternoon of Friday, April 21st. I hope you, your colleagues and the victims you serve can join us for these special events.

The Office for Victims of Crime is grateful to Justice Solutions, Inc. for developing the 2006 Resource Guide, a component of the National Public Awareness and Education Campaign coordinated by Justice Solutions with support from OVC.

The staff of OVC joins me in sending our best wishes to you and your colleagues as you plan and implement your 2006 National Crime Victims' Rights Week activities.

RE: Center on Victim Education Advocacy and Research (COVEAR)

Dear Ms. Stuart:

I am writing to express my strong support for Widener University School of Law's (WUSL), in coordination with Delaware Volunteer Legal Services (DVLS) and Child Incorporated, application for the Office on Violence Against Women's Legal Assistance for Victims Grant Program. Through this partnership and program, Widener University will establish a Center on Victim Education, Advocacy and Research (COVEAR).

Delaware Volunteer Legal Services is the pro bono arm of the Delaware State Bar Association and is located on Widener University's campus. Widener works very closely with the legal community throughout the state of Delaware. Child, Incorporated is a nonprofit organization working to provide services to victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. With the expertise and close working relationship between these three entities, the Center on Victim Education, Advocacy and Research will be able to reach out to victims of crime and assist in many aspects.

COVEAR will allow for both law students and legal professionals to receive the proper education and necessary training to be able to address and respond to the ill effects and severe trauma that victims of domestic violence and sexual assault experience. This training will allow for these legal advocacies to have a better understanding of the emotional dynamics associated with domestic violence and distinguish the best approaches to working with these victims. COVEAR will be a statewide initiative, offering symposiums, seminars and training sessions throughout Delaware, to better ensure the protection of the victim's needs and security through the legal process, while increasing the number of pro bono attorneys who are willing to take on these sensitive cases.

Dear Alberto Gonzales,

We would like to take this opportunity to inform you of the programs at Family Service of Greater New Orleans funded by the Louisiana Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Criminal Justice. The VOCA program and the Hate Crimes Project are both functioning as before. Below is a list of the services that can be provided by both programs.

The VOCA program provides free counseling services for those who have been victims of crime or have witnessed a crime. The VOCA program also provides agencies and organizations with educational presentations on trauma, coping skills and other relevant topics. If you would like to make a referral to this program, receive services or talk about having a presentation at your agency, please contact Dawn Barras, M.Ed or Dave Haynik, GSW at (504) 361-0926.

The Hate Crimes Project provides organizations and agencies with materials, education and referrals for victims, professionals and the general public. The Hate Crimes Project is an outreach program and relies on collaborations with other agencies to educate professionals and clients on the impact of hate crimes on the community. All services of the Hate Crimes Project are free. If you would like to discuss ways in which this program can work with you, please call Dave Haynik, GSW at (504) 361-0926.

Due to recent events, both programs are temporarily located at our West Bank office. We are hoping to be back at our Canal Street within the next month. We will continue to keep you informed of our correct contact information. Also, if you had a presentation previously scheduled, please contact us to reschedule. Thanks for your flexibility and understanding during these trying times. Also, please keep Family Service of Greater New Orleans in mind for any counseling needs that your organization may have.

Sincerely,

Honorable Gonzales:

Across the nation, challenges in the foster care system have only been addressed from a qualitative aspect. At this time, I offer the State of Michigan my expertise as a policy analyst by submitting a sophisticated model which will act as a lens to better view the inner workings of the current state of affairs in the foster care system.

I, sincerely, look forward to participating in discussions and decisions that will make Michigan an exemplary model for the rest of the country. I shall continue to present any significant findings of my future research.

I. ABSTRACT

In the last year, much attention has been focused on the numbers of children of color entering foster care in Wayne County, Michigan. The purpose of this study is to analyze the effects of the implementation of Personal Responsibility Opportunity Work Reconciliation Act (PROWRA)[1], 1996 and the relationship between economic hardships and the number of children entering foster care in Wayne County, Michigan over the time period of 1999 through 2004. A model will be constructed by co-opting Canadian Children's Welfare analytical techniques and observations of PROWRA enhancements to establish the correlation between poverty in Wayne County for the same period Wayne County Court-Administered County Child Care Fund: Foster Care Gross Expenditures October 1998 - September 2004[2].

It is hypothesized that a strong relationship exists between poverty and the numbers of children entering foster care. The goal of this analysis is to construct a model that will help Michigan assess, at the local level, the relationship between poverty and number of children entering foster care. This analysis was designed around a report by the State of Michigan Department of Human Services that led to the creation of a state task force, "to find out why black children...account for only for only 17.5 percent of Michigan's 2.6 million children overall but make up for 51.9 percent of children in the state's foster care system.[3]"

II. INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this monograph is to analyze systemic impacts on the number of children in foster care and in no way will address other factors pertaining to an individual's psychological challenges or illegal activities. The 1986 amended Title IV-E of the Social Security Act required states to develop a system to collect and report adoption and foster care data of child welfare agencies. It was not until 1993 that legislation was passed that allowed states the opportunity to receive enhanced funding through the Title IV-E program of the Social Security Act to plan, design, develop, and implement Statewide Automated Child Welfare Information System (SACWIS)[4] which supported the Adoption and Foster Care Analysis Reporting System (AFCARS)[5]. AFCARS was created in 1994 due to the lack of national information available on children in foster care. It was not until PROWRA extended funding through the fiscal year 1997 for SACWIS did data under the auspices of state child welfare agencies begin to be maintained. Under the "Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997" adoption incentives and funding for technical assistance (AFCARS) was reallocated through PROWRA addendum 1997 from Title IV-B to Title IV-E funding. Therefore, there is no complete reporting, nor accurate data reporting of foster care for Wayne County, Michigan prior to1998.

Even though the number of welfare recipients has decreased in Michigan by transitioning individuals from welfare to work, the numbers of unemployed steadily increased[6] as well as the number of children entering foster care due to the, "...failure of caretakers to provide for a child's fundamental needs. Although neglect can include children's necessary emotional needs, neglect typically concerns adequate food, housing, clothing, medical care and education"[7] This has impacted the numbers of children entering Wayne County foster care as a result of non-eligibility for social servicing. This is an issue that has been coined as "back-end funding," where medical, housing, food, special needs, and child care assistance is not accessible until a child has entered the system.

The focus of Michigan's Project Zero[8] was to decrease the number of welfare recipients by increasing the means tests for eligibility. This fueled a growing segment of the Wayne County population which can be named as "the working poor" who are mainly populations of color. Addressing another facet of the purported positive correlation between poverty and children entering foster care is the theoretical issue of welfare, itself. The actual application for social assistance becomes a legal admission of guilt for abuse and neglect. Because the parent is unable to provide the necessary needs of the child, the child automatically is considered to be under the auspices of state protection; therefore, any subsequent allegation of inability to provide the necessary needs of the child, thereafter, is regarded as a preponderance of factual evidence for abuse and neglect.

In September 2005, Detroit became the nation's most impoverished major city[9] with 47.8% of children living below the federal poverty level.[10] Children of color account for only 25.4% of Michigan's 2.6 million children overall but reflect 57% of the children in foster care.[11] The numbers for children of color in Wayne County foster care have been reported by numerous sources to be above the level of 90%, but the question is: Why?

III. METHODOLOGY

Because the data examined is time-series in nature, it must be noted that autocorrelation among the data will be evident in monthly total amounts for any given time length of observation and are not independent from the previous observation(s). The interrupted time-series model in this data analysis is to examine the intervention effects of policy changes from PROWRA enhancements. It is not intended to provide a complete explanation of time-series analysis nor dramatic results to achieve the goal of eliminating any disparities in the state's foster care system.

Hypothesis 1: An increase in the numbers of children entering the Wayne County Foster Care system is not associated with an increase in the number of persons impoverished in Wayne County.

Regression analysis using SPSS will be conducted to determine if there is a correlation between poverty and the number of children entering foster care. For the purposes of this study, unemployment is designated as the poverty component and the number of children in foster care system is estimated using the Court Administrated Child Care Fund Gross Expenditure.[12] The poverty and foster care components will be treated as econometric variables. Cases that fall outside 2 standard deviations of the regression line will then be investigated to see what Public Acts, laws, and/or policies of PROWRA enhancements functioned as a major interruption in the series, Court Administrated Child Care Fund Gross Expenditure: October 1998 through September 2004.

If cases are identified, a second regression will be run. The purpose of running a second regression with a dummy variable is to test each case that was found to be greater than 2SDs from the original regression line to establish which, if any, had a significant effect on the model estimates, and which case might provide the best evidence to be used as an intervention in the time series.

To test possible selection bias in the correlation of the error term for the measured variables, the gross expenditures and poverty, a two-stage least squares (2SLS) regression will be performed. If the first stage does not show a decline in the goodness of fit for the independent variable of unemployment, it will not present itself as an obstacle to continue into stage 2.

2SLS method will be performed for extending the regression. It is assumed, for purposes of constructing this model to investigate reasons for the significant number of children in Wayne County foster care, that the disturbance term of gross expenditures is correlated with the causes of poverty, (i.e. cost of living increase) which violates Ordinary Least Squares (OLS). The regression data will be described and removed before the 2SLS is analyzed.

The purpose of including 2SLS in the model building process is twofold: (1) to investigate the possibility if some of the data is cointegrated. If there is some linear combination of the time series that is stationary, for instance, PROWRA enhancements that led to a reduction in federal block grants which allow states to subsidize child care would tend to be roughly constant to the proportion of individuals with children who were in poverty. (2) To conduct a final goodness of fit test for independence for the dummy variable, the case with the most significant policy impacts, which fell 2SDs outside the initial regression line, that will function as an intervention variable for the time series. This process will lead into the construction of a second area of analysis:

> Hypothesis 2: The implementation of the 1996 PROWRA has generated a trend in the number of children entering the Wayne County Foster Care system.

The series of Wayne County Court Administrated Child Care Fund gross expenditures for the fiscal years 1999-2004 will be analyzed as an interrupted time series to identify any trend, seasonality, and random error. Model specification will be the identification of ARIMA parameters: Integrated component (d), Autoregressive component (p), Moving average component (q).

DOJ_NMG_0143146

IV. ANALYSIS

Initial observation in the relationship between the number of children entering Wayne County, signified by the annual Court Administrated Child Care Fund: Foster Care Gross Expenditures in Wayne Count and Wayne County children, age 5-17, in families in poverty (Table 1)[13] indicated an extreme and highly significant, strong correlation. A simple regression was performed which resulted in an R = .9324. Due to the small sample size, 5, an alternative measurement of poverty was sought. It was determined that unemployment would best interpolate poverty by providing a reflection of the geographic economy for Wayne County.

Dependent Variable: The variable, Wayne County Court-Administered County Child Care Fund: Foster Care Gross Expenditures, October 1998-September 2004, shall be, henceforth, referred to as "grossexp" (TABLE 2).

Table 1: Wayne County Court-Administered County Child Care Fund: Foster Care Gross Expenditures October 1998 - September 2004

Data were extracted from Michigan Family Independence Agency (now known as the Department of Human Services) Publication 292, 2005 by the Office of Budget and Policy Analysis. Initial description of the grossexp histogram found it to have an approximately normal distribution (M=7,533,297.6528, SD= 4,371,828.56099, Skewness = -.101, Range = 15,600,936.00, Minimum = 805,959.00 Maximum = 16,406,895.00, $\sum$= 542,397,431.00, n=72).

Independent Variable: Data for the variable, Wayne County Unemployment Monthly Totals, were extracted from the U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics Data, for the October 1998-September 2004 series and were not seasonally adjusted. The monthly totals for Wayne County unemployment series will be termed as the variable, "poverty" for the purposes of this analysis (TABLE 3).

Table 2: Wayne County Unemployment Monthly Totals: October 1998-September 2004

A histogram for poverty showed an approximately normal distribution (M=61228.03, SD=16530.203, Skewness=.133, Sum=4,408,418, Range=61,046, Minimum=32,633, Maximum=93,679, n=72). It must be noted that unemployment cannot be calculated as an average rate due to the declining population in Wayne County. Annotations by the U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics have some preliminary monthly estimates, reflecting 2000 based geography, new model controls, 2000 Census inputs, and methodologies on federal and state levels, with revisions pending.[14]

Visual analysis of the relationship between grossexp and poverty variables demonstrated a parallel path for each (Table 4). Collectively, grossexp and poverty will be referred to as "Monthly Foster Care Data".

Regression: A linear regression of grossexp against poverty was run with a 95% Individual Prediction Interval. A strong, positive correlation was found ($r=.726$, $df=70$, $p<.05$), indicating a significant linear relationship between monthly totals of poverty and the Foster Care Gross Expenditures (TABLE 5).

A visual examination of this graph suggest that there is evidence of a strong linear relationship between an increase in the monthly poverty totals and child care court administrated expenditures in Wayne County.

OLS Linear Regression interpretation: The prediction equation that describes the relationship between the number of children in foster care and poverty is

$$y_{hat} = -4{,}219{,}849 + 191.957x$$

Every additional person in unemployed in Wayne County is associated with a $191.96 increase in Wayne County Court Administrated County Child Care Fund: Foster Care Gross Expenditures. A better understanding into the relevance of this interpretation can be put differently; bi-weekly total payment rates for a youth placed in foster family care for ages 0-12, $199.36[15] and the Wayne County Court-Administrated County Child Care Fund daily average per child of $194.23. Therefore, more relative understandings into the interpretation of the relationship can be stated: every additional person unemployed in Wayne County is associated with a two week length of stay for a youth placed in foster family care for ages 0-12, and/or every additional person unemployed in Wayne County is associated with a Court Administrated County Child Care Fund: Foster Care Gross Expenditures daily average per child of $194.23[16].

Casewise Diagnostics: Cases, #36 (September 2001=2.069), #39 (December 2001=2.825), #48 (September 2002=2.361), and #63 (December 2003=2.087), were identified to be greater than 2 SD's (1.986) from the regression line (TABLE 7).

For cases #36 and #39, The 106th Congress of January, 24, 2000 passed the "Strengthening Abuse and Neglect Courts Act of 2000"[17]. Basically, the Act provided grants (1) to state courts and local courts to automate the data collection and tracking of proceedings in abuse and neglect courts (SACWIS) and (2) to reduce pending backlogs of abuse and neglect cases to promote permanency for abused and neglected children in state and local courts, and (3) to expand the court-appointed special advocate program in underserved areas. Simultaneously, Michigan passed Public Acts 46[18] and 491[19] that restructured probate court to expedite the hearing of child abuse and neglect cases and substantially increased funding to abuse and neglect courts. This same Congress also passed "The Child Abuse Prevention and Enforcement Act"[20]. Authorizations were made to state child welfare agencies, organizations, and programs that "engaged in the assessment of risk and other activities related to the protection of children, including protection against child sexual abuse, and placement of children in foster care". Much of the funding went to increased awareness programs and expansion of staffs. Michigan implemented these acts at the end of the fiscal year of 2000, September 2001, #36.

In January 2001 Michigan passed the amendment to the Probate Code of 1939 Act 288 of 1939 that set a timeline for Termination of Parental Rights as 12 months[21].

The federal government had already set a timeline that ranged from 15 to 22 months for Termination of Parental Rights to be filed. Michigan strongly departed from federally established policy for family preservation by severely reducing the timeframe for parents to obtain assistance for reunification. Another factor that might be a reactionary effect to this case is the implementation of the Electronic Transfer Benefit (EBT) program that came under federal scrutiny in 2002. The USDA report[22] cited areas of program improvements for the assessed period of September thorough December 2001.

Case #63 might be a reactionary effect to the "Keeping Children and Families Safe Act of 2003", June 23 2003, where the 108th Congress increased grants to states and public or private agencies and organizations for programs relating to the investigation and prosecution of child abuse and neglect cases. Also, during this time period, the State of Michigan began pilot programs to reduce the numbers of children entering the system because it was on Tier 2 for Program Improvement Plans and had incurred severe financial penalties for not meeting AFCARS benchmarks. A major shift to kinship care, where immediate relatives care for children with no financial assistance, reduced the financial burdens of the state and county.

Since this was the first time in many years that Detroit did not reach its mark in the 2000 Census as a major city with a population over 1,000,000, a large amount of federal monies were cut from the Wayne County budgets, numerous Michigan FIA programs funded by federal Block Grants were cut, and Wayne County's FIA Project Zero (whose goal was to follow mandates of PROWRA to reduce the roles of welfare recipients). There were dramatic economic conditions that took place in Wayne County in 2001 that resulted in the increased poverty.

After researching the legislative significance of the four aforementioned, diagnosed cases, the one that contained the greatest PROWRA enhancements, as well as the second highest SD (2.069), was #36. Cases prior to September 2001 were coded (0) and cases post were coded (1). The inclusion of this variable in the model building process was to test model fit for the identified case (lag 36) in becoming the intervention variable for analysis of the time series. When grossexp was regressed against case #36 and poverty, it demonstrated the greatest impact of the four identified cases, but was extremely biased in results ($R = .019$, $R^2 = .000$, $n=36$), with no significance. Parsimony of the model supported the deletion of the poverty variable, and the regression was rerun (TABLE 8).

The results of linear regression for grossexp against case #36 was significant (R^2=.587, F<.001). The prediction equation for months prior to September 2001 is:

$$Y_{hat} = 4{,}113{,}375 + 6{,}654{,}985(0).$$

For the months beginning with September 2001:

2SLS: To test possible selection bias in the correlation of the error term for the measured variables, grossexp and employ, a 2SLS regression was performed. Grossexp was regressed against the instrumental variable and explanatory variable, employ (TABEL 9). The first stage showed slight decline in the goodness of fit for the independent employ but did not present itself as an obstacle to continue into stage 2.

In stage 2 of 2SLS, the estimated probability of selection computed in stage 1, now named as grossexp2, is used as an independent variable. The OLS regression was run with the actual dependent variable, grossexp, with the independents of grossexp2 and the dummy variable. Unemploy was not included in the regression because of the assumption of multicollinearity. The OLS coefficient for the grossexp2 was not significant at the .05 level and the regression coefficients were similar for the dummy variable in the two regressions (TABLE 10); therefore, it was concluded that selection bias was not a problem. It should be noted that if the level of significance is increased to .10, it may lead to evidence of selection bias. The OLS coefficients were retained for analysis of the time series.

The purpose of including 2SLS in the model building process is twofold: (1) to investigate the possibility if some of the data is cointegrated. If there is some linear combination of the time series that is stationary, for instance, PROWRA enhancements that led to a reduction in federal block grants which allow states to subsidize child care would tend to be roughly constant to the proportion of individuals with children who were unemployed. (2) to conduct a final goodness of fit test for independence for the dummy variable to function as an intervention variable for the time series.

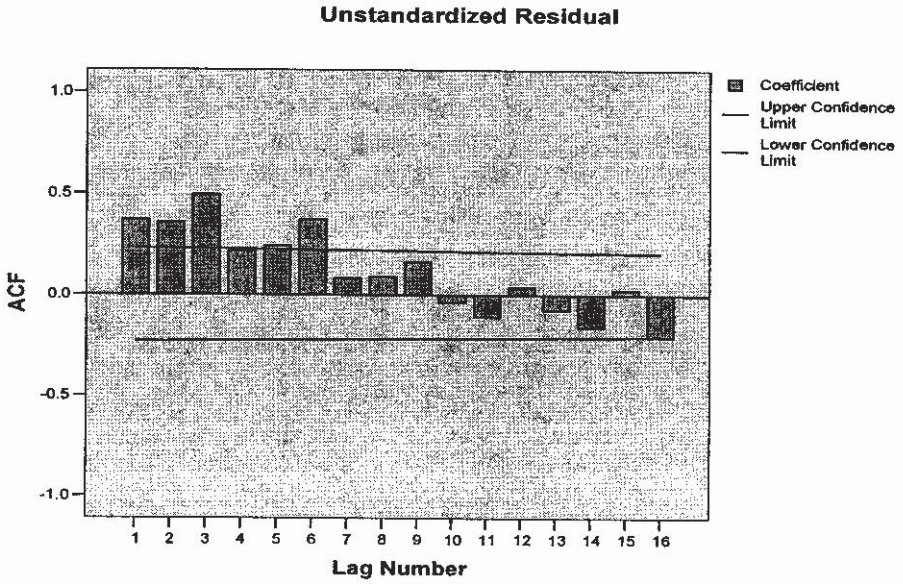
V. MODEL SPECIFICATION



I. Identification of ARIMA parameters:

Integrated component (d): The unstandardized residuals from the linear analysis were saved as a new variable. Next, lagged autocorrelation analyses were run on the residuals from the linear analysis. ACF for grossexp raw data showed solid no evidence for a nonstationary process; therefore, no differencing was necessary to transform the series for estimated ACF. Because the ACF did not effectively show zero for all lags

DOJ_NMG_0143155

(values of lags to lie within the +/- 2 SE of the CI and are statistically different than zero at a .95 confidence level) it indicated that the series was not the realization of a white noise process and that there were shocks integrated within the series. The resulting lagged ACF for the linear residuals of the monthly grossexp are graphed in TABLE 11.

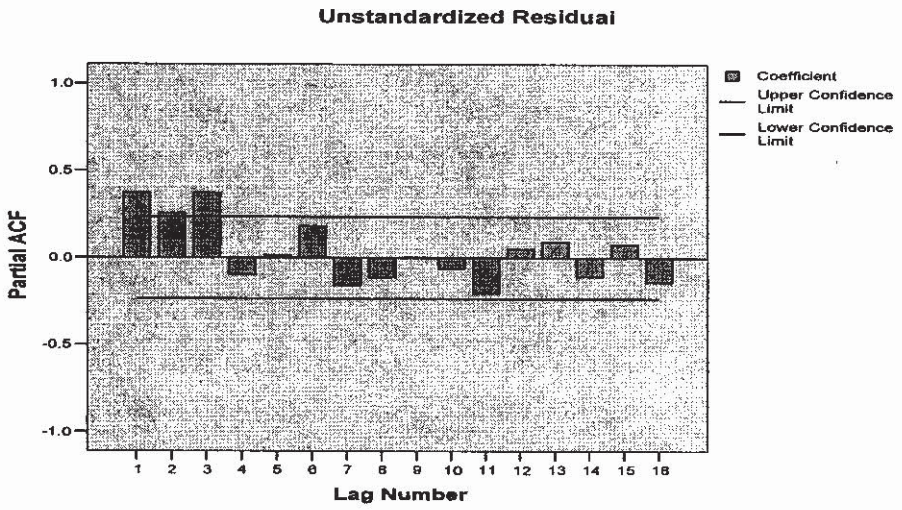


TABLE 11: Lagged Autocorrelation Function for Monthly Foster Care Data

Autoregressive component (p): The more recent an event, the greater its influence on the current realization. There is indicated autoregression in a rough pattern of spikes with ACF. Autocorrelation was detected in grossexp (d=1.225, d_L=1.60, d_U=1.65, n=72, K=1, Sig.> .001). A visual examination of PACFs determined that there was third-order autocorrelation, (ϕ_3 = -.011, ϕ_{SE}=.119) (TABLE 12). The Box-Ljung statistic supported the significance of autocorrelation at each lag (.000), but, because PACF (1) is contained within the bounds of stationarity, - 1 < ϕ_1 < + 1, the same as θ_1, the ARIMA (0,0,q) model is realized and it is found a moving average, autocorrelation may not prove to be significant in this model. Another procedure to detect significant autocorrelation is the Pankrantz criterion. If the autocorrelation divided by its SE is less than 1.25 for the first three lags and less than 1.60 for subsequent lags, it may be concluded that the series has no significant autocorrelation. As noted with ϕ_3 (-.011), it was concluded that there was no significant autocorrelation for this model.

TABLE 12: Lagged Partical Autocorrelation Function for Monthly Foster Care Data

The third-order autocorrelation may be explained in the "bottlenecking" of the court system. Because the data observations are not independent to the previous two observations, there may be theoretical correlation within the mandatory 90-day dispositional hearing cycle for children. Once a child has entered the foster care system under temporary state custody and throughout the length of stay, until the last permanency planning hearing, mandated at 182 days, delays the issuances of court orders and notifications for hearing dates which will have the 90 day dispositional hearing cycle overlap to become a 120 day cycle, causing an overflow of the courts. Another carry-over effect of the dispositional cycle, which would explain third-order correlation, might be the inability of child welfare agencies to coordinate mandated servicing.

Until recently[23], foster care in Michigan operated as "cookie-cutter" servicing, where all family reunification goal-orientated cases were proscribed identical servicing (i.e. parenting classes, individual therapy). The reduction of community resources and the increased demand for them creates another temporal factor that extended the lengths of stay for children in foster care. PROWRA enhancements terminated referrals for community resources and caused children to linger in the system longer, simply because a family could not access, in a timely fashion, servicing that had been ordered by the courts, or were referred to services that were either no longer in existence or reduced. Michigan's Freedom of Information Act allowed Child Welfare to function as a closed system; only certain resources were classified as acceptable to child welfare agencies. An example of this would be the "state v. state" issue. The State cannot violate federal HIPPA law by relinquishing personal information; therefore, a birth parent cannot utilize a state funded resource to fulfill court requirements for family reunification and must stand in line. The greater the influx of birth parents being mandated servicing, the longer the waiting lists became: "first-in, first-out" (FIFO).

Moving average component (q) Because there is a single spike in the first lag, ACF(1) and the series is uniformly zero, it is concluded that this is an ARIMA (0,0,1) model for moving average because of the non zero values for ACFs. As time passes, random shocks leak out of the system at an exponential rate the influence of random shocks on a time series observation, thus decreases exponentially with time. ACF (1) had a nonzero integer first lag ($\theta_0 = -.495$) and is, thus, constrained to the bounds of invertibility, $-1 < \theta_1 < +1$, for the ARIMA (0,0,1) process and was noted as an integrated and infinite process. Each realization process consists of an infinite sequence of all past random shocks integrated or summed with a "starting" value, or constant.

This stochastic element, white noise, might be theorized in the historical social constructs of economic disparities: geographic constraints due to poor mass transit and lack of affordable, quality housing; factory model educational systems and public school funding from millage taxes based on property values; urbanization taking the money out the tax bases of the urban structures; heavy metal fallout such as industrial emissions of mercury and lead based paint in older homes that has exponentially demonstrated emotional and cognitive challenges and disabilities on generations; and past shocks such as the decline of the automobile manufacturing industry in Detroit, where no one prepared and the city relied solely upon it for viability and sustainability. This would mean that poverty, as represented in this analysis as unemployment, has an extreme influence on the number of children in foster care because poverty is considered to be a form of abuse and neglect, which is "suspected as criminal activity"[24].

Intervention Variable: The dummy variable (#36) that was earlier constructed has now come to be the intervention variable (ωI_t) in the time series for grossexp, where September 2001 is the point of departure. Data was coded 0 = pre-intervention and 1 = post-intervention. There was discovered to be an extremely strong positive correlation between the aforementioned date and grossexp (R=.838). No autocorrelation was detected (d=1.710, d_L=1.60, d_U=1.65, n=72. K=1); therefore, it may be purported that this lag (#36), is a time of major influence for the increased numbers of children entering foster care.

Constants: Since it was determined no differencing was necessary to make the series into a stationary process, the constant term will be equal to the mean of the series (TABLE 13).

II. Estimation

ARIMA (0,0,1): A non-seasonal forecasting model using Unconditional Least Squares, with the model constant for initialization and inclusion of ωI_t had no realization of constraints in the bounds of stationarity ($-1<\phi<+1$) because it was shown that were decaying PACFs which further indicates a moving average. It was determined that there was no autoregression, but had statistically significant MA parameters (θ_2= -.302, t = -2.624) constrained to the bounds of invertibility ($-1<\theta<+1$) for grossexp that produced 2 iterations (TABLE 9). The parameter estimates of the tentative model, θ_0 (-.431, t = .106) and θ_1 (t = 4.446), are not statistically significant, so the parameter is dropped from the model. Because these two parameter estimates are statistically insignificant, they are interpreted as drift in the series and support the process of trend. There was no more than one ARIMA model to use in comparison to test a goodness of fit measure, such as nested models, so Akaike Information Criterion (AIC) and Bayesian Information Criterion (BIC), did not need to be reported in the residual diagnostics.

III. Diagnosis

Model fit: There were no significant ACFs and PACFs estimated from the model residuals indicating a perfect fit ($p < .001$). Residuals are not different than white noise and all lags of the residual of the ACF are statistically significant by randomness. To test whether the entire residual ACF is different than that expected of a white noise process, the Q statistic formula was used:

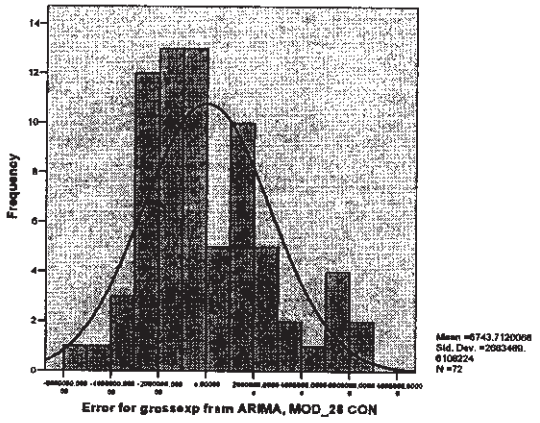
where; $H_0 : Q = 0$ is distributed as a χ^2 with df determined by k lags of ACF residuals, subtracting the number of autoregressive and moving average parameters used in the model, and i replaces t as the point of intervention. The Q(15,1.117249) at $p < .005$ was found significant, so the null hypothesis was rejected. The tentative ARIMA model was determined to be statistically adequate, because the residuals were not different from white noise.

Residual Analysis: An approximately normal distribution of residuals indicated a good ARIMA model and the Box-Ljung statistics have significance levels of .001, or better than 99.9%, for the series as a test of randomness (TABLES 12 and 13)

TABLE 12: Histogram of ARIMA Residuals for Foster Care Monthly Data



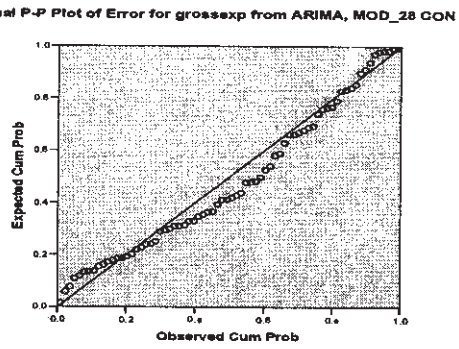


TABLE 13: P-P Plot ARIMA Residuals for Foster Care Monthly Data

Impact assessments: The confirmatory analysis of this time series quasi-experiment was a test of the null hypotheses that the postulated event (PROWRA enactments) caused a change in a social process (foster care) and is measured as a time series (Wayne County Court Administrated Child Care Fund Expenditures for Fiscal Years 1999-2004). The event is represented as a binary variable (0,1) which indicates the absence of the state a prior to the event and the presence of the state during and after the event. The intervention component is written as where, $I_t = 0$ in the pre-intervention equation and $I_t = 1$ in the post-intervention equation, where the level of the y_t series changes with each passing moment and is expected to produce a nonzero result. The model parameter ($\delta = .419$, $t = 17.977$) was statistically significant which represents a gradual and permanent impact (linear trend) in the County Child Care Fund: Foster Care Gross Expenditures, as δ is constrained to the bounds of system stability ($0 < \delta < 1$). Therefore, the model is written as

It shows the impact of the intervention as a gradual duration. The level of the post-intervention series continues to grow by larger amounts,

$$y_{36+n} = .419y_{36+n-1} + 6688525.693(1).$$

As n grows infinitely large, this level may be evaluated as $$\text{asymptotic change} = .419/(1 - 6688525.69) = -6.26446069E\text{-}8.$$

Interpretation: In the 36th month, September 2001, the level of this series increased $6,688,525.69, on average, in monthly totals for the Wayne County Child Care Fund: Foster Care Gross Expenditures. The PROWRA enhancements of 2001 are thus expected to result in an eventual reduction of nearly $6.26 per month in Wayne County Court Administrated Child Care Fund Expenditures. The change in level from month to month is infinitesimally miniscule, so it may be further concluded: (1) we must fail to reject $H1_0$: an increase in the numbers of children entering the Wayne County Foster Care system is not associated with an increase in the number of persons impoverished in Wayne County, and (2) fail to reject $H2_0$: the implementation of the 1996 PROWRA has generated a positive linear trend in the number of children entering the Wayne County Foster Care system.

Seasonal effects: The months of March, September and December show substantial spikes in the series. Theory for March might be that families begin to experience the financial burdens brought on by the Christmas season and spring recess for schools[25]. In Wayne County there are very limited day care programs that are accessible and affordable for families. September may be represented in the number of calls placed by educators to Child Protective Services concerning lack of after-school care, clothing, and food, and other behavioral concerns for children returning to school. December also provides high numbers for poverty. Lack of affordable housing forces children and families into homeless shelters in Wayne County where many children are removed from parents under the category of poverty, being a form of abuse and neglect. During the summer months, you have a reduction in staffing levels due to vacations of Child Protective Service workers. Also, much of the foster care industry redirects its focus from seeking "suspected criminal offenders"[26] to recruitment of foster families. May is foster care month. It must be recognized that September and December are fiscal quarters and represents changes in budgets.

Lag effects: Because the stochastic fluctuations are stationary and have been discriminated as white noise, a viable explanation to possible monthly lag effects might be what was addressed earlier as autocorrelation in the 90 day cycle of dispositional hearings and extended lengths of stay for children in foster care[27].

VI. CONCLUSION

Further Research: A Harmonic Analysis may provide a better model fit because it can estimate the amplitude of trend, seasonal effects are known a priori, and more accurately describe the Mean. Additional fiscal years will provide the necessary 80 minimum required lags to allow the usage of more powerful analytical programs and may describe a different conclusion. Utilizing parametric methods for a continuous-time regression event history model might shed light on Wayne County's poor performance in the rates of Family Reunification.

Another aspect that should be investigated is in the area of funding for the foster care system: juvenile delinquency. Children are being classified and sentenced as juvenile delinquents in order to access different levels of funding; therefore, a stronger correlation between Court Administrated County Child Care Fund expenditures and poverty may exist.

Comparative county analyses within Michigan should be performed to test the validity of my findings.

Implications: I submit the findings of this analysis to give credence to the design of Michigan's Child Protection Services; it functions in accordance to the construction of the policy. Simply put, large numbers of children will continue to enter Wayne County foster care and will linger in the system for long lengths of stay, as a direct result of Michigan's rulemaking of federal PROWRA enhancements. I state, again, as poverty rises, so will the number of children entering the foster care system.

Family preservation policies[28] for Michigan do not have ethical grievance procedures, or a valid investigative forum, for child welfare agency accountability. Director for the Office of Children's Ombudsman has been made a governor cabinet position. If the role of the governor is to protect its citizens by adopting and implementing child protective policies, then how can the Office of Children's Ombudsman be an unbiased, investigative entity regarding violations of child protective policies? If the role of the Attorney General is to prosecute cases of abuse and neglect, then how can there be a valid forum for administrative oversight for commercial licensing of child welfare agencies, regarding misfeasance, as well as malfeasance? How can an abuse and neglect case be ethically judicated when the presiding judge is affiliated in the activities of the child welfare agency that is managing the case without prejudice? How can Child Protective Proceedings mandate that only an expert, defined as being licensed by the state, testify in abuse and neglect cases when case managers of child protective agencies are not licensed, and in many instances, do not even possess a university degree? Michigan circumvented this area of licensing by re-classifying job titles for social workers to case managers in 2004. Because a case manager is not licensed, there can be no investigation by the state because the Department of Consumer Industries only has jurisdiction to respond to grievances pertaining to individuals who are licensed. Grievances are handled internally with the child welfare agencies under U. S. Civil Servant Codes. This means, if there is a complaint to be filed against the director of the child welfare agency, it will be facilitated and decided by the director of the child welfare agency.

Recommendations: The State of Michigan has been attempting to address the issues of racial disparities in Wayne County, particularly for people who do not hail from dominantly European decent, or more succinctly, African-Americans. I provide three suggestions:

(1) Focus on the economic conditions rather than race. On going research of Golebiowska and Michelini (2005) have established that Detroit (Wayne County) political appeals are "not influential by activating racial predispositions".[29] I submit the concept of living, breathing policies. If the United States Constitution is considered to be a living, breathing document that can be continuously interpreted and applied to a current frame of time, then policies of foster care should, also. Endogenous growth theory (Reid 1989)[30] would take into consideration major economical disaster that would allow individual foster care cases to be addressed in a more cost-effective manner than the current decision making model that is being used. A more proactive approach in family preservation in the area of front-end funding programs for individual/family therapy, affordable and quality child care, affordable housing, and career employment as with opportunities for educational, vocational and entrepreneurial support might prove to be a long term cost effective approach for the state;

(2) Amend Michigan's "Foster Care and Adoption Services Act, 203 of 1994" and "Probate Code of 1939 Act 288 of 1939" to bring the time limitations for Termination of Parental Rights in accordance with the federal "Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997" from 12 months to 15 out of 22 months;

(3) Expand the oversight and redefine the role and powers of the Office of Children's Ombudsman as an independent, investigative authority over the grievance process for:

(a) judicial review, attorney generals, guardians ad litem, and defense attorneys;
(b) revocation or suspension of the license of a direct child welfare service employee who is found guilty of misfeasance[31];
(c) internal investigations and external audits of private/commercial child welfare agencies, Foster Care Review Boards, Family 2 Family mediations, foster family placements, and civil rights violations.

Not only is this economically feasible, but it is technically feasible. In opposition to sweeping, state legislative changes, the latter recommendation might operate as a sieve to filter though the severe cases of abuse and neglect. Financing of these reforms might be allocated from Michigan's Children's Trust Fund. Reducing the strains of the court by expediting the process of permancy placements for adoption, the number children entering foster care and the lengths of stay for children in the foster care system might meet federal benchmarks, and, prove to eradicate the racial disparities of children in foster care Wayne County, as well as the entire State of Michigan.

One underlying factor is the issue of poverty.

Re: Federal assistance with methamphetamine crimes in Washoe Indian Country

Dear Attorney General Gonzales,

I would like to express my gratitude for your willingness to work with me on addressing the virulent threat to the health and safety of Washoe Tribal members, and in fact to our very culture, posed by crystal meth. As we discussed at the Latino Leadership Luncheon last November, and as I further relayed to you in my letter of November 2, Washoe Indian Country has not been spared from the methamphetamine, or crystal meth, problem that is sweeping the nation. Washoe Tribal land is composed of primarily four reservation communities: Carson Colony, Stewart Community, and Dresslerville Community in Nevada, and Woodfords Community in California. To varying degrees, each of these communities have been plagued by non-Indian sellers and buyers of crystal meth, who have been taking advantage of the gap in law enforcement jurisdiction and the limited number of Tribal law enforcement personnel. I look forward to continuing our dialogue to determine how we can work together to combat this growing danger to our communities. In particular, I welcome the opportunity to meet with you on February 8 to discuss this issue.

A substantial part of this problem stems from non-Indian buyers and sellers of crystal meth coming onto Washoe reservations or residing on Washoe reservations with Tribal members. As you know, the federal government has a trust responsibility to protect Tribal communities from violations of federal drug laws on the reservation, particularly those committed by non-Indians. Due in part to the lack of jurisdiction to arrest non-Indians for violation of federal drug laws, and in part to the limited size of the Washoe Tribal Police Department, the Washoe Tribe needs the Department of Justice's assistance with crystal meth interdiction efforts, to investigate, enforce, and prosecute federal drug crimes on the reservation. The Washoe Tribal Police Department has a relatively small number of officers, currently only seven, who must spread their time across the four Tribal communities, which are separated by as much as 42 miles. There is a great need for federal agents to be available to work with Tribal police officers to plan and conduct joint operations, as well as to provide necessary surveillance equipment and additional training to Tribal police officers. Because Tribal police officers are well-known in the communities, it is difficult for Tribal police officers to go undercover to make a drug buy for a sting operation. Thus, dealing with this drug problem may also require working with undercover federal agents to conduct drug buys on the reservation. Implementation of a program for the sharing of law enforcement intelligence with federal law enforcement agencies may also be a key component in the interdiction of crystal meth flowing through Tribal communities.

The Washoe Tribe would like to pursue a memorandum of understanding or other formal agreement with the Department of Justice in order to establish a federal-tribal partnership on this issue. Although the Tribe has been negotiating a mutual aid agreement with Carson City and Douglas County for similar assistance with regard to enforcement of state drug laws against non-Indians, such an agreement does not seem likely due to the local governments' insistence that the Tribe defend and accept liability for the negligence and willful misconduct of city or county officers if suit is brought against them in Tribal Court. The Tribe has attempted to work with BIA law enforcement in the past, as well as cooperating with other Tribal law enforcement agencies in the area, but BIA has only one narcotics officer for the district and Tribal law enforcement agencies tend not to have the necessary experience or a sufficient number of officers to be able to lend officers out for joint operations.

Of course, making arrests for violation of federal drug laws would only be half the battle. It is also necessary to ensure that federal prosecutions of crystal meth cases arising from Tribal lands will be given a high priority by the U.S. Department of Justice. Otherwise, the U.S. Attorney's Office may choose not to prosecute some crystal meth cases which normally may not meet the U.S. Attorney's Office guidelines for priority prosecutions. A reluctance to prosecute such crimes is not acceptable considering the virulent problem posed by crystal meth drug crimes on the reservation and the impact they have on reservation communities. I would like to discuss with you getting such a policy established within the U.S. Attorneys offices.

Another important component of this law enforcement problem is the lack of sufficient detention facilities available for housing criminals. While Tribal officers may arrest non-Indian suspects on reservation lands within Nevada (by virtue of state law, Nevada Revised Statutes 171.1255) for violations of state drug laws, local detention facilities are overcrowded, sometimes resulting in the parole of drug offenders, who often return to commit further drug crimes on the reservation. There is no corresponding law allowing Tribal officers to arrest non-Indian suspects for state law offense within the Washoe Tribe's Woodfords Community in California. As for Indian criminals, BIA detention facilities are limited and scant funding exists from the BIA to subcontract with local jurisdictions for detention space, which may not be abundant anyway. This lack of sufficient detention facilities impacts Tribal arrests, prosecution, and sentencing of Indian offenders, and may therefore result in Indian drug offenders remaining in Tribal communities. Assistance from the DEA and FBI in making arrests of both non-Indians and Indians for federal drug offenses in crystal meth cases would allow for offenders to be appropriately sentenced to federal detention facilities. (However, sentencing of juvenile offenders may be more appropriately handled by the Tribe's Juvenile Drug Court, which is funded under a grant from the Department of Justice's Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention.)

Crystal meth poses a significant threat to Washoe Tribal communities. The Tribal government and Tribal members have recently begun a number of substantial efforts to deal with the danger to our people, our communities, and our culture posed by crystal meth. Establishing a partnership with the Department of Justice is a critical component of our efforts, and I look forward to working with you on this issue. I have also sent a letter on this matter to DEA Administrator Karen Tandy. I am confident that the three of us can work together to develop an effective solution to the crystal meth problem in Washoe Indian Country. Thank you again for taking time out of your busy schedule to meet with me on February 8 to discuss this pressing concern of the Washoe Tribe.

Methamphetamine & Chemicals Initiative in Indian Country (Issues and Recommendations)

— revised Jan. 19, 2006 —

1. DOJ COPS funding has been dramatically reduced in Indian Country and many Tribes who have COPS program efforts are at or have exceeded the normal three year grant term. This has resulted in the loss of hundreds of Police Officer positions. There is a great need to permanently restore funding for these positions (BIA, DOJ, etc.).

2. There exist very drastic challenges in securing detention space for the housing of criminals to offset the enforcement and interdiction efforts in Indian Country at current levels of arrests. Any increase in enforcement activity would multiply that challenge. In addition, current detention alternatives have been declared deplorable by the Interior Office of the Inspector General; however, the problem is even greater. Many Tribes simply have no detention facilities available unless they have the ability to subcontract with local jurisdictions (cities/counties). The challenge here is that most cities and counties are overcrowded themselves or the costs for contracted detention space are exorbitant or prohibitive. Moreover, the BIA has very limited funding (or none at all) to pay for these costs. The result is that arrests are curtailed and Tribal Courts have nowhere to sentence convicted criminals, or have to explore less secure sentencing alternatives that endanger the Tribal communities.

3. Federal, state, and local law enforcement agencies have exhibited reluctance for various reasons (funding, ethnocentric, or discriminatory) to forcefully exercise "exclusive criminal jurisdiction over non-Indians" who represent a majority of the criminal activity associated with crystal meth supply and demand in Indian Country. It should be noted that NJC Report 203097 has documented that American Indians experience violence at a rate more than twice the rate for the entire nation. To offset this enforcement impediment, one solution would be to federally deputize Tribal Police officers to enforce criminal jurisdiction over non-Indian criminals. Currently, most Tribal Police agencies are funded through the BIA and DOJ and enjoy the protections and coverage of the Federal Tort Claims Act, and some already have federally trained and commissioned officers.

4. There is a need for special consideration for prosecuting Meth cases originating on Tribal Lands when they would not normally meet USAO District Guidelines (as in a recent meth case involving Mexican traffickers in Wyoming's Wind River Indian Reservation). These should be looked at from the "impact" and "repeat offender" standpoints.

5. There is a need for assistance and guidance in training of Tribal Police and Tribal first responders regarding clandestine laboratory response, hazardous waste clean-up, remediation, Drug Endangered Children procedures, and EPIC Clandestine Lab Seizure System incident reporting. Basically, Tribal Police and Tribal first responders need to be brought into the mainstream of "best practices" already established throughout the U.S.

6. There is a need for assistance and guidance to control retail sales of precursors/chemicals from stores on Tribal lands (Tribally regulated at this time).

7. There also must be implemented some type of program to exchange law enforcement intelligence with outside agencies. Crystal meth distributors are well organized and operate both on and off reservations as their needs dictate. Often, reservations are used as "safe havens" to avoid outside law enforcement agencies who are already investigating their drug trafficking activities.

8. Finally, there exists a need for guidance and assistance in establishing a viable Indian Country public awareness campaign warning adults and especially Indian youth about the dangers of meth use.

The Honorable Alberto Gonzales
Attorney General

Washington, DC 20530

Dear Mr. Attorney General:

I am writing about the Crime Victims Rights Act (Title I of the Justice for All Act (P.L. 108-405)). It is my understanding that the Administration's proposed budget, now being finalized, will recommend less than the full funding for the amounts authorized in that statute.

In the past, as you know, I have sought an appropriation to fully fund the victims rights implementation programs authorized in Section 103 — an appropriation, I should add, that draws off none of the revenue from the Crime Victims Fund, which I believe should be treated as inviolate (this position represents a bedrock dedication that I share with many others to giving full force to both the Crime Victims Rights Act and the Victims of Crime Act).

My disappointment in the Administration's plan to recommend less than full funding is leavened by its desire to increase the level of financial support over last year's. That is not a small gesture in a time of fiscal austerity, and I will be pleased to report to supporters of the Crime Victims Rights Act that, if the Administration's proposal is adopted, it will represent a promising step in the right direction.

For Fiscal Year 2008, let me again urge that the budget request full funding ($33.5 million) for Sections 103(b) and (c), the most important of which is subsection (b)(4) which authorizes $11 million for the crime victims' clinics. Funding for the crime victims' clinics should be given the highest priority.

As you know, all the victim rights' implementation programs included in Section 103 of the Crime Victims Rights Act were designed to make a good faith effort through such a statute to give victims of Federal crime the rights we have long sought to afford them through a Constitutional amendment. Some of the very early tests of the use of the law are encouraging, but, I regret to say, some are not. Of all the techniques we devised to make the law meet its stated goals, by far the most effective one in helping victims exercise their rights in both state and Federal courts is the establishment of clinics. While the other approaches we devised are helpful in enforcing victims' rights, none can claim a greater ability of making the law work than a victim having the ability to find redress for any violation of his rights by taking that matter to court — with the assistance of counsel and supportive services.

I look forward to continue to work with you in the advancement of victim rights and services.

Sincerely,

JON KYL

Dear Ms. Stuart:

I am contacting you to offer my support on behalf of the YWCA of Greater Harrisburg. They are currently planning to open a legal clinic in the area that will provide legal representation to meet the civil legal needs of victims of domestic violence, and sexual assault, along with numerous other civil matters.

As you know they are in need of funding, as their Congressman I am pleased to support their application for assistance with their project. I believe that this innovative idea will be a blessing to those unfortunate victims of domestic and sexual violence that reside within the 17th Congressional District. Enclosed is a summary of their project and the invaluable services that they will offer.

Thank you in advance for your consideration of their application.

Sincerely,

Tim Holden

ABSTRACT

This project responds to the unmet civil legal needs of victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, and/or stalking in Dauphin County, Pennsylvania by supporting direct legal services on behalf of victims in civil matters, including protection from abuse ("PFA"), divorce, spousal/child support, child custody/visitation, administrative matters, bankruptcy, wills, powers of attorney, housing, and immigration matters.

We propose to provide a full-time attorney responsible for assessing cases, providing legal representation for said cases, and referring appropriate cases to Widener Law School's Harrisburg Civil Law Clinic to maximize the number of victims served. This project will reach the currently underserved areas of rural northern Dauphin County and inner-city Harrisburg. The YWCA Legal Clinic will maintain a satellite legal office at the Community Check-Up Center to provide convenient access to services for residents of the Hall Manor and Hoverter Homes public housing communities. We will provide two full-time legal advocates serving at five community locations to best reach the identified populations most in need of services, including indigent, low-income, rural, and limited-English victims. Our advocates will perform case intake and assessments under the supervision of the project attorney and provide accompaniment and support to victims at domestic violence, sexual assault, and/or stalking-related court proceedings.

In addition to direct legal services, the YWCA Legal Clinic will provide domestic violence, sexual assault, and safety planning practical education to identified Widener Law School staff and students and Community Check-Up Center health care professionals. In addition, the YWCA Legal Clinic will offer comprehensive educational programs in our community that specifically target populations most in need of services, as well as programs for agencies and organizations that commonly interact with individuals from targeted populations

Ms. Diane M. Stuart, Director

I write in support of the Edwin Gould Services for Children and Families-- Steps to End Family Violence application for the Legal Assistance for Victims grant program CFDA #16.524, Opportunity #OVW 2006-1204.

STEPS has operated in my congressional district for over 19 years providing a myriad of needed services to victims of domestic violence. STEPS has demonstrated a special expertise in working with women victims of domestic violence. These women have special needs, and this organization has focused on addressing these needs and empowering the women to move ahead with their lives.

I understand from Steps to End Family Violence that they propose to provide on-site legal advocacy and service for up to 700 clients within two years. A good part of my district encompasses Spanish speaking population that is in desperate need of legal advocacy. STEPS believes that they are well suited to provide on-site legal advocacy services without the benefit of a collaboration with a legal services organization. From their experience they are capable because they currently provide limited legal advocacy services and have the expertise and infrastructure of a legal services department currently in place within the curriculum of domestic violence/sexual assault victim services programs.

I wholehardly support STEPS in attaining this grant for the benefit of my constituents in need of such services.

Sincerely,

Charles B. Rangel

Dear Ms. Mitchell:

I am writing in support of the application for the 2006 Legal Assistance for Victims grant, CFDA # 16.524, from the United States Department of Justice, Office of Violence Against Women, submitted by the YWCA of Northwest Georgia, Inc. They seek $448,965.

I understand that the YWCA of Northwest Georgia is seeking to establish a family law center that would specialize in issues related to domestic violence and sexual assault. I am told that the YWCA works collaboratively with several county agencies in both referrals and in providing direct services to victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. I believe this has allowed them to offer critical and compassionate services. It appears that the judicial, enforcement and victim services providers all effectively work together to impact the causes and consequences of domestic violence and sexual assault.

I would appreciate your positive consideration of this grant request based on the merits of the application. If I can assist in any way, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Very truly yours,

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: Acting THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL 10/19/05

FROM: GLENN A. FINE
INSPECTOR GENERAL

SUBJECT: Office of Justice Programs
Annual Financial Statement
Fiscal Year 2004, as Restated

This memorandum transmits the final report on the audit of the Office of Justice Programs (OJP) restated Annual Financial Statement for the fiscal year (FY) ended September 30, 2004. This audit was performed pursuant to the Government Management Reform Act of 1994, which requires submission of the audit report to the head of the agency.

The OJP received an unqualified opinion on the single year presentation of its restated FY 2004 financial statements. This audit was a re-audit of OJP's FY 2004 financial statements. As such, the Independent Auditors' report is presented as a single year stand alone report for FY 2004 only. The auditors reported three material weaknesses related to improvements needed in: (1) OJP's controls over the grant advance and payable estimation process; (2) financial reporting, monitoring, analysis and documentation; and (3) general and application controls for electronic data processing. In addition the auditors reported one reportable condition that identified the need for improvements in OJP's grant and non-grant de-obligation process.

In their report on compliance and other matters, the auditors concluded that OJP's financial management systems did not substantially comply with federal financial management system requirements or with applicable federal accounting standards. The auditors also reported non-compliance with Office of Management and Budget Circular A-50, Audit Follow-up and Resolution Policy, and the Inspector General Act of 1978, Prompt Management Decisions, on timeliness of follow-up actions; the Prompt Payment Act on incorrect calculation of interest payments; and the Improper Payments Information Act on completeness of risk assessments.

If you have any questions or would like to meet to discuss the audit, please contact me on (202) 514-3435 or Marilyn A. Kessinger, Director, Financial Statement Audit Office, on (202) 616-4660.

Dear Ms. Shiels:

I write to request your assistance in calling attention to the Teen Dating Violence Awareness and Prevention Initiative by participating in a national news conference to be held on February 6, 2006. As you know, teen dating violence, a dreadful crime in and of itself, has also been shown to be a precursor to adult domestic violence.

I am aware that you have been working with Moreen Murphy of the American Bar Association (ABA) Steering Committee on the Unmet Legal Needs of Children on its Teen Dating Violence Prevention Initiative. With funding and support from the U. S. Department of Justice, and support from the U. S. Department of Health and Human Services and the U. S. Department of Education Safe and Drug Free Schools, state teams of teenagers developed Awareness and Prevention Toolkits for high schools to be sent out during a National Teen Dating Violence Awareness and Prevention Week. The Toolkits contain awareness and prevention strategies for parents, teenagers, judges, police, attorneys, medical and psychological professionals, domestic violence and other community organizations.

I sponsored a Senate resolution declaring February 6 – 10, 2006, National Teen Dating Violence Awareness and Prevention Week and Congresswoman Juanita Millender-McDonald sponsored a similar resolution in the United States House of Representatives. Both resolutions passed in December 2005.

The news conference will begin at 10:15 a.m. at Woodrow Wilson Senior High School in Washington, D.C. to kick-off the Week's activities nationwide. Other Initiative partners and Members of Congress who have co-sponsored the Resolution have been invited. I would be honored if you could attend. Your invaluable support and influence will help further the success of this Initiative. Teen dating violence is a terrible disease that affects our communities and families and knows no boundaries: rural, urban, socio-economic levels, race or gender. Please consider joining with me in this media event.

Thank you for your consideration of this matter. Laura Thurston Goodroe or Alison Aikele of my staff at (202) 224-6142 are available to provide further details.

RE: CFDA# 16.524
2006 VAWA Legal Assistance Grant support for Columbia Legal Services

Dear Ms. Stuart:

I am writing to express my support of Columbia Legal Services' reapplication to the Department of Justice to fund legal assistance to survivors and victims of domestic violence in our community. I voted in favor of H.R. 3402 which reauthorizes Department of Justice (DOJ) programs through fiscal year 2009 as well as provisions of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) through fiscal year 2011. I feel strongly that anyone who commits acts of domestic violence must be held accountable and that, as a nation, we must do better to prevent violence and protect our citizens.

Domestic violence knows no boundaries and it's important that victims receive the help and support they need. People escaping from domestic violence need emotional, physical and legal support. Legal intervention is one of the tools we can use to stop the cycle of domestic violence for families in need. Columbia Legal Services provides direct legal representation and support to victims of domestic violence. In addition, funding provides for bilingual advocates, culturally sensitive outreach programs to the Spanish speaking community, and enables referrals to volunteer attorneys.

Please give this application your every consideration. If there should be further questions regarding this matter, please contact Ms. Tina Lee Johnson at my district office at (253) 893-3787 or by fax at (253) 896-3789.

Thanks, Cybele. I'll take a closer look at this when I return. In the meantime, could you help me with some of the acronyms in the timeline. I can't figure some of them out. And can you please identify the individuals (as well as the offices) who worked on the project.

Thx

Courtney -- Attached for your review when you return is a timeline of events leading up to the AG memo and draft response. Based on what we learned from timeline and our discussions with CFA we recommend that someone here sign the response to CFA not the AG.

Let me know what else you need and how you want to proceed on response.

Hope you are having a great time.

Dear Mr. Attorney General:

At the recent public meeting of the Commission of Fine Arts on 21 July 2005, the Commission members discussed the design for the Department of Justice 9/11 Heroes Medal of Valor which was submitted to the Commission for their review as required under the medal's authorizing legislation. The medal was submitted by the Department of the Army Institute of Heraldry and we responded on 8 July 2005 to the Institute's Director, Mr. Fritz Kirklighter, that due to the brief period allowed for the review, the Commission would not be able to review the medal as required.

The Commission members requested during the public meeting that we communicate to you their disappointment in the quality of the design for the 9/11 Heroes Medal of Valor, which they feel is not commensurate with the medal's importance. They regret the unfortunate timing of the medal's submission to the Commission of Fine Arts, resulting in a missed opportunity to improve what should be the highest-quality artistic display of our nation's commemorative expression.

We look forward to closer coordination in the future with your agency when the review of design for medals and other commemorative items is required.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of BJS Publication

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication State Court Organization, 2004 (NCJ 212351), by David Rottman and Shauna Strickland of the Conference of State Court Administrators and National Center for State Courts, for BJS.

DISCUSSION: State Court Organization, 2004 presents detailed comparative data by State trial and appellate courts in the United States. Topics covered include: the number of courts and judges; process for judicial selection; governance of court systems, including judicial funding, administration, staffing, and procedures; jury qualifications and verdict rules; and processing and sentencing procedures for criminal cases. Diagrams of court structure summarize the key features of each State's court organization.

COORDINATION: This volume is the 5th release in a series from which data collection and report preparation was carried out by the National Center for State Courts (NCSC). Review of tables was coordinated with Conference of State Court Administrators and staff from BJS.

DISSEMINATION: The more than 300 pages of text will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination at the time of release. When printed, this report will be distributed to judges, court administrators, and other members of the court community, as well as by federal and state policymakers, criminologists, researchers, journalists, and members of the public.

TIMETABLE: BJS will make this publication available, in its entirety, 30 days from the date of this memorandum.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of BJS Publication

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003 (NCJ 205331), by Mark Motivans of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003 presents data on Federal criminal justice trends from 1994-2003. This report summarizes the activities of agencies at each stage of the Federal criminal case process. It includes 10-year trend statistics on the number arrested (with detail on drug offenses); number and disposition of suspects investigated by U.S. attorneys; number of persons detained prior to trial; number of defendants in cases filed, convicted, and sentenced; and number of offenders under Federal correctional supervision (incarceration, supervised release, probation, and parole). Highlights include the following:

• From 1994 to 2003 the number of suspects/defendants increased steadily across the stages of the Federal criminal justice system:

Stage	Number of suspects/ defendants processed 1994	2003
Suspects investigated	99,251	130,078
Suspects arrested and booked	80,730	131,064
Defendants charged	62,327	92,085
Defendants convicted	50,701	75,805
Defendants sentenced to prison	33,022	57,629

• Growth in immigration and weapons offenders
The 10-year average annual increase was greatest for immigration (ranging from 14% for arrests to 25% for prison sentences imposed) and weapon offenses (ranging from 10% for prosecution to 11% for matters investigated by U.S. attorneys).

• Southwest United States produced a disproportionate share of suspects and defendants processed
Five of 94 Federal judicial districts (Southern District of California, District of Arizona, District of New Mexico and Southern and Western Districts of Texas) comprised 31% of all suspects arrested and booked, 19% of suspects investigated, 23% of defendants in cases filed in U.S. district court, and 28% of offenders sentenced to prison (1994-2003).

• Greater likelihood of suspects prosecuted, defendants convicted, and offenders sentenced to prison
The percent of suspects prosecuted (of matters concluded by U.S. attorneys) increased from 54% in 1994 to 62% in 2003.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination at the time of the press release. When printed, this report will be distributed to criminal justice practitioners, policymakers, and others who have indicated an interest in this subject. We have consulted with the OJP Office of Communications, and they have made preliminary plans to issue a press release.

TIMETABLE: The press release is anticipated for Sunday, August 27, 2006, at 4:30 p.m. EDT. BJS will begin distributing this publication at that time.

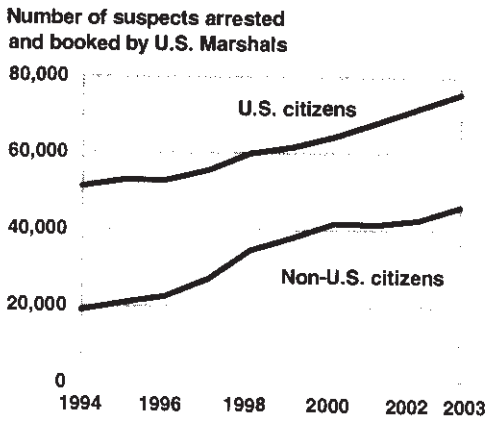
Q & A's for Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003

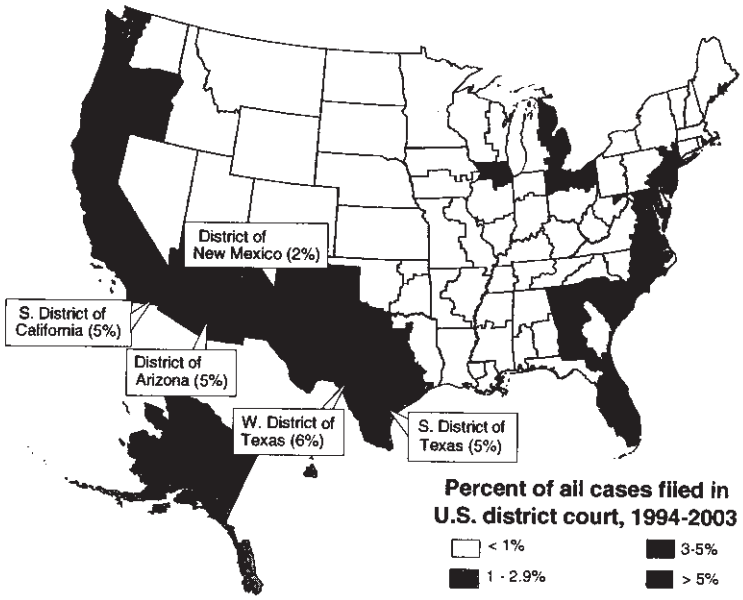
Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003 is the first in a new series designed to track trends in the Federal justice system. BJS uses data received from eight Federal justice agencies to describe the enforcement of several thousand Federal statutes in the U.S. Criminal Code. Publication of this report, while not mandated by statute, serves as a uniform reference volume on Federal criminal case processing trends.



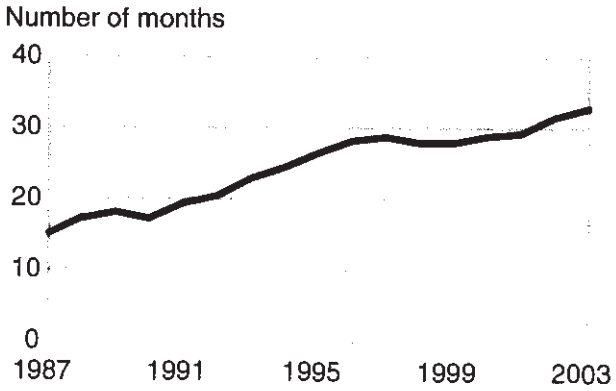
Q. What are significant findings from this report?

A. The number of suspects/defendants processed in the Federal criminal justice system increased to record levels. Over 130,000 suspects were investigated by U.S. attorneys in 2003 up from 99,000 in 1994. Federal legislation and Justice's enforcement initiatives addressing the problem of illegal immigration resulted in immigration being the offense with the greatest 10-year average increase across case processing stages (14% average yearly increase in immigration arrests and 25% increase in prison sentences imposed). The number of drug offenders sentenced to prison increased a yearly average of 6% and weapon offenders increased 10% over this period.

From 1994-2003 suspects had a greater likelihood of being prosecuted, defendants convicted, and offenders sentenced to prison.



The number of non-U.S. citizens in the Federal criminal justice system steadily increased from 1994-2003. Thirty-eight percent of suspects arrested and booked by the U.S. Marshals Service (USMS) in 2003 were non-citizens compared to 27% in 1994. Of the 152,459 prisoners in custody of the Federal Bureau of Prisons, 28% were non-U.S. citizens.



Q: How were Federal criminal cases distributed across the U.S. over this period?
A: From 1994-2003 a notable share of suspects and defendants were processed in the Southwest. Five Federal judicial districts (Southern District of California, District of Arizona, District of New Mexico and Southern and Western Districts of Texas) comprised 31% of all suspects arrested and booked, 20% of suspects investigated, 23% of defendants in cases filed in U.S. district court, and 28% of offenders sentenced to prison (1994-2003).

Five out of 94 Federal judicial districts comprised 23% of all criminal cases filed in U.S. district court from 1994-2003

Q. How much time did inmates released from prison serve (on average)?
A: During 2003, 40,780 prisoners were released for the first time from Federal prison after commitment by a U.S. district court. The average time served for all offenses was 33 months. Average time served by Federal offenders increased from 25 months for those released in 1994 to 33 months for offenders released in 2003.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of an OJJDP Publication

PURPOSE: To provide you with advance copies and notification of the pending release of National Evaluation of the Title V Community Prevention Grants Program (Online Report) (NCJ 212214).

DISCUSSION: This Online Report presents the findings from a multiyear, multisite national evaluation of the Title V Community Prevention Grants Program. Through Title V, OJJDP provides communities with funding and a guiding framework for developing and implementing comprehensive juvenile delinquency prevention plans that meet their unique circumstances and risk conditions.

This Report presents the experiences of 11 communities in 6 states that implemented the basic principles of the Community Prevention Grants Program. Specifically, the Report examines how the program affected these communities, including the benefits they received and the challenges they encountered. It also analyzes the national evaluation team's efforts to design and implement a national assessment that balanced the information needs of the federal government with the evaluation capacity of local Title V communities.

Talking Points for National Evaluation of the Title V
Community Prevention Grants Program
(OJJDP Online Report)

Recognizing that community-based programs and local involvement are critical components of delinquency prevention efforts, OJJDP provides communities with funding and a guiding framework for developing and implementing comprehensive delinquency prevention plans. For more than a decade, OJJDP's Title V Community Prevention Grants Program has helped communities prevent delinquency and improve the lives of youth and their families.

Beginning in 1998, OJJDP undertook a multiyear, multijurisdictional evaluation of the Community Prevention Grants Program to examine the viability and effectiveness of its delinquency prevention model. Based on input from national experts in designing and conducting evaluations of comprehensive program initiatives, the evaluation tests the key assumptions on which the program model rests.

This Report presents the experiences of 11 communities in 6 states that implemented the basic principles of the Community Prevention Grants Program. Specifically, the Report examines how the program affected these communities, including the benefits they received and the challenges they encountered. Evaluation findings include the following:

- Title V means different things to different communities. For some communities, it means communitywide systems change; for others, it means implementation of one or more specific prevention programs. These differences can be attributed to whether the community was previously exposed to comprehensive prevention planning at the time it was introduced to the Title V model.

- A reasonable plan generally means communities are trying to affect no more than three risk factors and are implementing no more than two or three prevention strategies.

- Having subscribed to "program first" thinking for years, some local prevention policy board members were reluctant to embrace a more comprehensive planning model that emphasized "assessment first, program planning later."

- Because the Title V model is complex, especially for communities with little experience with collaborative, communitywide prevention efforts, it is important to encourage local leaders to start small. Over time, after communities have reassessed their local risk and protective factors, they can modify or enhance existing efforts or put new programs and strategies in place.

- Most of the communities struggled to develop and implement local evaluation plans. Suggestions for improving evaluation efforts include: emphasizing program evaluation and risk-factor tracking; building state-level evaluation capacity to monitor and support local-level evaluation; mandating evaluation and set-aside funds to support it; and requiring the use of evidence-based programs.

Since the inception of the Title V Community Prevention Grants Program in 1992, overall, progress has been made. Communities have become better at collaborating, assessing their local needs, identifying appropriate strategies, and institutionalizing and evaluating local efforts.

The national evaluation described in this Report provides a framework for understanding both the process and progress of the Title V Program. As one of the nation's first comprehensive, community-based prevention initiatives, Title V offers a unique opportunity for OJJDP and others in the field of delinquency prevention to observe communities nationwide as they attempt to translate theory into practice. Findings from the national evaluation have helped OJJDP refine the Title V model.

The national evaluation provided opportunities to learn firsthand about the challenges of evaluating comprehensive, community-based initiatives like Title V. As the evaluation progressed, so did other national evaluations of comprehensive, community-based initiatives. In combination, these national evaluation team experiences can help inform future national evaluations of programs like Title V by identifying what works in terms of methodology, design, and data collection activities and how best to support communities to participate fully in large evaluation projects.

SUBJECT: BJS Statistical Release Report, July 2006

This memorandum contains three sections:

1) Publications
2) Statistical tables and web content that are not printed
3) Recently released materials.

Each section is sequenced by expected release date.

Final release dates are determined by receipt and verification of final data.

Publications:

Press release:
Yes [blank means No]

Bureau of Justice Statistics Publications Collection CD-ROM, as of December 31, 2005

(P. Middleton) Contains all of the BJS publications that are available electronically and were published before December 31, 2005. Linked lists of titles are presented alphabetically, chronologically, and topically for use with a web browser. Materials are presented in Portable Document Format (PDF), ASCII text, or spreadsheet formats. Expected release date around 07/15/2006.

National Corrections Reporting Program, 2002 CD-ROM
(T. Hughes, A. Beck) Presents data on admissions, releases, and parole outcomes of persons in the Nation's State prisons and parole systems, including demographic characteristics, offenses, sentence length, type of admission, time to be served, method of release, and actual time served of inmates exiting prison and parole. In 2002, 39 States reported data. Included on the CD-ROM are ASCII files that require the use of specific statistical software packages, a code book, statistical software setup files, and explanatory notes. Expected release date around 07/15/2006.

Improving Criminal History Records for Background Checks, 2005
(G. Ramker) Describes the achievements of the National Criminal History Improvement Program (NCHIP), its authorizing legislation and program history. This annual Bulletin summarizes NCHIP-funded criminal record improvement efforts, including improved accessibility of records, full participation in the Interstate Identification Index, the automation of records and fingerprint data, and improvements in the National Instant Criminal Background Check, National Sex Offender Registry, and domestic violence and protection order systems. The report provides examples of projects aimed at enhancing the involvement of the courts and system integration in improving disposition reporting. The report also discusses the Bureau of Justice Statistics' efforts to improve performance measurement including the development and use of a Records Quality Index. Expected release around 07/21/2006.

Prosecutors in State Courts, 2005
(S. Perry) Presents findings from the 2005 National Survey of Prosecutors, the latest in a series of data collections from among the Nation's 2,300 State court prosecutors' offices that tried felony cases in State courts of general jurisdiction. This study provides information on the number of staff, annual budget, and felony cases closed for each office. Information is also available on the use of DNA evidence, computer-related crimes, and terrorism cases prosecuted. Other survey data include special categories of felony offenses prosecuted, types of nonfelony cases handled, number of felony convictions, number of juvenile cases proceeded against in criminal court, and work-related threats or assaults against office staff. Expected release date around 07/30/2006.

Yes Sexual Violence Reported by Correctional Authorities, 2005
(A. Beck, P. Harrison) Presents data from the Survey on Sexual Violence, 2005, an administrative records collection of incidents of inmate-on-inmate and staff-on-inmate sexual violence reported to correctional authorities. The report provides counts of sexual violence, by type, for adult prisons, jails, and other adult correctional facilities. The report provides an indepth analysis of substantiated incidents, including where the incidents occur, time of day, number and characteristics of victims and perpetrators, nature of the injuries, impact on the victims and sanctions imposed on the perpetrators.

The appendix tables include counts of sexual violence, by type, for all State systems, the Federal Bureau of Prisons, and all sampled jail jurisdictions. The report also includes an update on BJS activities related to implementation of the data collections required under the Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003 (Public Law 108-79). Expected release around 07/30/2006.

Federal Law Enforcement Officers, 2004

(B. Reaves) Reports the results of a biennial census of Federal agencies employing personnel with arrest and firearms authority. Using agency classifications, the report presents the number of officers working in the areas of police patrol and response, criminal investigation and enforcement, security and protection, court operations, and corrections, by agency and State, as of September 2004. Data on gender and race of officers are also included. Expected release date around 07/31/2006.

Yes Violent Felons in Large Urban Counties

(B. Reaves) Presents data collected from a representative sample of felony cases that resulted in a felony conviction for a violent offense in 40 of the Nation's 75 largest counties. The study tracks cases for up to 1 year from the date of filing through final disposition. Defendants convicted of murder, rape, robbery, assault or other violent felony are described in terms of demographic characteristics (gender, race, Hispanic origin, age), prior arrests and convictions, criminal justice status at time of arrest, type of pretrial release or detention, type of adjudication, and sentence received. Expected release around 08/06/2006.

Background Checks for Firearm Transfers, 2005

(M. Hickman, D. Adams) Describes background checks for firearm transfers conducted in 2005. This annual report provides the number of applications checked by State points of contact, estimates of the number of applications checked by local agencies, the number of applications rejected, the reasons for rejection, and estimates of applications and rejections conducted by each type of approval system. It also provides information about appeals of rejected applications and arrests for falsified applications. The Firearm Inquiry Statistics Program is an ongoing data collection effort focusing on the procedures and statistics related to background checks in selected States. Expected release around 08/15/2006.

Black Victims of Violent Crime, 1993-2004

(E. Harrell) Presents findings about violent crime experienced by non-Hispanic blacks. Data on nonfatal violent victimization (rape/sexual assault, robbery, aggravated and simple assault) are drawn from the National Crime Victimization Survey. Data on homicides are drawn from the FBI Uniform Crime Reporting Program's Supplementary Homicide Reports. Comparisons are made with the victimization experience of other racial/ethnic groups. Findings include 1993-2004 violent victimization rates by victim characteristics. Also examined are crime characteristics, including weapon use, police reporting and police response to violent crime incidents. Trends in violent victimization are also discussed. Expected release date around 08/15/2006.

Compendium of Federal Justice Statistics, 2004
(M. Motivans) Presents national-level statistics describing characteristics of persons processed and the distribution of case processing outcomes at each major stage of the Federal criminal justice system. This annual report includes data on investigations by U.S. attorneys, prosecutions and declinations, pretrial release and detention, convictions and acquittals, and sentencing and appeals. This report also provides statistics on fugitive investigations by the U.S. Marshals Service. Electronic only. Expected release around 08/15/2006.

Yes Drug Use and Dependence, State and Federal Prisoners, 2004
(C. Mumola) Presents data from the 2004 Survey of Inmates in State and Federal Correctional Facilities on prisoners' prior use, dependence, and abuse of illegal drugs. Tables include trends in the levels of drug use, type of drugs used, and treatment reported by State and Federal prisoners since the last national survey was conducted in 1997. The report also presents measures of dependence and abuse by gender, race, Hispanic origin, and age. It provides data on the levels of prior drug use (with an indepth look at methamphetamine use), dependence, and abuse by selected characteristics, such as family background, criminal record, type of drug used, and offense. Expected release date around 08/15/2006.

Yes HIV in Prisons, 2004
(L. Maruschak) Reports the number of female and male prisoners who were HIV positive or AIDS active, the number of AIDS-related deaths in State and Federal prisons, a profile of those inmates who died, and a comparison of AIDS rates for the general and prisoner populations. This annual bulletin uses yearend 2004 data from the National Prisoner Statistics and the Deaths in Custody series. Supplemental information from the 2004 Survey of Inmates in State and Federal Correctional Facilities is provided in this report including estimates of HIV infection among prison inmates by age, gender, race, Hispanic origin, education, marital status, current offense, and selected risk factors such as prior drug use. Expected release date around 08/15/2006.

Yes Medical Problems of Jail Inmates
(L. Maruschak) Presents findings on jail inmates who reported a current medical problem, a physical impairment or mental condition, or an injury since admission based on data from the 2002 Survey of Inmates in Local Jails. The prevalence of specific medical problems and conditions are also included. The report examines medical problems and other conditions by gender, age, time served since admission, and select background characteristics. Expected release date around 08/15/2006.

Yes Mental Health Problems of Prison and Jail Inmates

(D. James, L. Glaze) Presents estimates of the prevalence of mental health problems among prison and jail inmates using self-reported data on recent history and symptoms of mental disorders. The report compares the characteristics of offenders with a mental health problem to other inmates, including current offense, criminal record, sentence length, time expected to be served, co-occurring substance dependence or abuse, family background, and facility conduct since current admission. It presents measures of mental problems by gender, race, Hispanic origin, and age. The report describes mental health problems and mental health treatment among inmates since admission to jail or prison. Findings are based on the Surveys of Inmates in State and Federal Adult Correctional Facilities, 2004, and the Survey of Inmates in Local Jails, 2002. Expected release date around 08/15/2006.

State Court Organization, 2004

(D. Rottman, S. Strickland, T. Cohen, BJS project monitor) Presents detailed comparative data by State trial and appellate courts in the United States. Topics covered include: the number of courts and judges; process for judicial selection; governance of court systems, including judicial funding, administration, staffing, and procedures; jury qualifications and verdict rules; and processing and sentencing procedures for criminal cases. Diagrams of court structure summarize the key features of each State's court organization. This fifth edition of State Court Organization is a joint effort of the Conference of State Court Administrators, the National Center for State Courts, and BJS. Expected release date around 08/15/2006.

Yes Criminal Victimization, 2005

(S. Catalano) Presents estimates of national levels and rates of personal and property victimization for the year 2005. Rates and levels are provided for personal and property victimization by victim characteristics, type of crime, victim-offender relationship, use of weapons, and reporting to police. Annual average victimization rates for 2004-05 are compared with those of the previous two years, 2002-03. A section is devoted to trends in victimization from 1993 to 2005. Estimates are from data collected using the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS), an ongoing survey of households that interviews about 76,000 persons in 42,000 households twice annually. Violent crimes included in the report are rape/sexual assault, robbery, aggravated assault and simple assault (from the NCVS), and homicide (from the FBI's UCR program). Property crimes examined are burglary, motor vehicle theft, and property theft. Expected release around 08/20/2006.

DOJ_NMG_0143236

Yes Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003

(M. Motivans) Presents data on Federal criminal justice trends from 1994-2003. This report summarizes the activities of agencies at each stage of the Federal criminal case process. It includes 10-year trend statistics on the number arrested (with detail on drug offenses); number and disposition of suspects investigated by U.S. attorneys; number of persons detained prior to trial; number of defendants in cases filed, convicted, and sentenced; and number of offenders under Federal correctional supervision (incarceration, supervised release, probation, and parole). Expected release around 08/27/2006.

Census of State and Local Law Enforcement Agencies, 2004

(B. Reaves) Reports the results of a census, conducted every four years, of all State and local law enforcement agencies operating nationwide. The report provides the number of employees of State and local law enforcement agencies as of September 2004, including State-by-State data for sheriffs' offices, local police departments, State police and highway patrol agencies, and special jurisdiction police. Expected release date around 08/31/2006.

Jails in Indian Country, 2004

(T. Minton) Presents findings from the 2004 Survey of Jails in Indian Country, an enumeration of 68 confinement facilities, detention centers, jails, and other facilities operated by tribal authorities or the Bureau of Indian Affairs. BJS conducted the survey on June 30, 2004. Included are the numbers of adults and juveniles held, seriousness of offense, persons confined on the last weekday of each month, average daily population, peak population and admissions for June, and inmate deaths. Numerical tables also summarize rated capacity, facility crowding, and jail staffing.

For the first time, information was collected on four infectious diseases, including HIV, hepatitis B and C, and tuberculosis. Other new information is presented on inmate medical and mental health services, suicide prevention, substance dependency programs, domestic violence counseling, sex offender treatment, educational programs, and inmate work assignments. Expected release date around 08/31/2006.

Organizations as Defendants in the Federal Justice System, 1994-2005

(M. Motivans) Describes criminal cases brought against organizations including business entities set-up to conduct commercial activities and hold assets as well associations, unions, and unincorporated and nonprofit organizations. Federal statutes for the most part do not differentiate between organizational and individual defendants, applying similarly to both. This special report describes criminal case processing of organizational defendants, the crimes that bring them to the Federal justice system, and case outcomes. It includes the number of organizations in matters investigated by U.S. attorneys, the number prosecuted, convicted and sentenced, and organizations on Federal supervision. Expected release date around 08/31/2006.

Survey of State Procedures Relating to Firearm Sales, Midyear 2005
(D. Adams) Provides an overview of the firearm check procedures in each State and State interaction with the National Instant Criminal Background Check System (NICS), operated by the FBI. The report summarizes issues about State procedures, including persons prohibited from purchasing firearms, restoration of rights of purchase to prohibited persons, permits, prohibited firearms, waiting periods, fees, and appeals. Supplemental tables contain data on 2004 applications to purchase firearms and rejections, as well as tabular presentations of State-by-State responses. This is one of a series of reports published from the BJS Firearm Inquiry Statistics (FIST) project, managed under the BJS National Criminal History Improvement Program (NCHIP). Expected release around 08/31/2006.

Law Enforcement Management and Administrative Statistics, 2003: Data for Individual State and Local Agencies with 100 or More Officers
(B. Reaves) Presents agency-specific data collected from more than 800 State and local law enforcement agencies employing 100 or more officers based on the 2003 Law Enforcement Management and Administrative Statistics (LEMAS) survey. The report provides agency-specific information on the characteristics of the largest law enforcement agencies nationwide. Large agencies are described in detail for such issues as staff and financial resources, technologies and equipment in use, and policies and practices of the agencies on a wide array of law enforcement and administrative concerns. Summary data for State police and highway patrol agencies, municipal police departments, county police departments, and sheriffs' offices are also included. Expected release date around 09/15/2006.

Yes Intimate Partner Violence
(S. Catalano) Examines fatal and non-fatal violence by intimates (current or former spouses, girlfriends, or boyfriends) since the redesign of the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) in 1993. Victim characteristics such as race, sex, age, income, and ethnicity are presented. Measured crimes include murder, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, and simple assault experienced by males and females age 12 years and older. In addition, characteristics of the victimization are presented such as offender use of alcohol/drugs, offender use of weapons, location, time of day, reporting to police, injury and medical treatment, and presence of children in the household. Data for this Internet only release are from the NCVS and FBI's Supplementary Homicide Reports. Expected release date around 08/15/2006.

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE Acting ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL 7/20/06

THROUGH: Regina B. Schofield
Assistant Attorney General
Office of Justice Programs

FROM: Jeffrey L. Sedgwick
Director, Bureau of Justice Statistics

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of BJS Publication

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of (NCJ 212750), by Brian Reaves of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Federal Law Enforcement Officers, 2004 reports the results of a biennial census of Federal agencies employing personnel with arrest and firearms authority. Using agency classifications, the report presents the number of officers working in the areas of police response and patrol, criminal investigation and enforcement, inspections, security and protection, court operations, and corrections, by agency and State, as of September 2004. Data on gender and race of officers are also included. Highlights include the following:

- As of September 2004, about 3 in 4 Federal law enforcement officers working outside the Armed Forces were employed within the Department of Homeland Security or the Department of Justice.

- Federal officers' duties included criminal investigation (38%), police response and patrol (21%), corrections and detention (16%), inspections (16%), court operations (5%), and security and protection (4%).

• The largest employers of Federal officers were U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) (27,705), the Federal Bureau of Prisons (15,214), the FBI (12,242), and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) (10,399). Ten other agencies employed at least 1,000 officers.

• The combined officer employment of CBP and ICE in 2004 was 21% greater than the comparable combined totals of the INS, U.S. Customs Service, and Federal Protective Service in 2002.

• Women accounted for 16% of Federal officers in 2004. A third of Federal officers were members of a racial or ethnic minority in 2004. This included 17.7% who were Hispanic or Latino, and 11.4% who were black or African American.

• About half of the Federal officers in the U.S. were employed in Texas (14,633), California (13,365), the District of Columbia (9,201), New York (8,159), or Florida (6,627). New Hampshire and Delaware, with 112 each, had the fewest Federal officers.

• Nationwide, there were 36 Federal officers per 100,000 residents. Outside the District of Columbia, which had 1,662 per 100,000, State ratios ranged from 90 per 100,000 in Arizona to 7 per 100,000 in Iowa.

COORDINATION: As in the previous versions of this report for 1996, 1998, 2000, and 2002, the data are the result of a cooperative effort involving BJS and staff in all Federal agencies employing personnel with arrest and firearms authority. Within the Department of Justice, this included the BOP, FBI, DEA, USMS, ATF, and IG Office.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination upon release. When printed, this report will be distributed to criminal justice practitioners, policymakers, and others who have indicated an interest in this subject.

TIMETABLE: BJS will make this publication available 30 days from the date of this memorandum.

Federal Law Enforcement Officers, 2004

Every two years the Bureau of Justice Statistics conducts a census of Federal law enforcement officers. The census provides basic information about Federal officers, including their employing agency, gender, race, ethnicity, primary job function, and the State in which they primarily perform their duties. The most recent census collected data for the reference date of September 30, 2004.

Q. Which agencies does the BJS Census cover?
A. The 2004 Census of Federal Law Enforcement Officers covers 65 Federal agencies employing full-time personnel with the authority to make arrests and carry a firearm. The total includes 27 offices of inspector general. Because of limitations on the availability of data for some agencies, the BJS census does not include the Armed Forces (Army, Navy, Air Force, Marines, and Coast Guard), the Federal Air Marshals (in the Department of Homeland Security), or the Central Intelligence Agency.

Q. Is the number of Federal law enforcement officers increasing?
A. The Federal agencies included in the 2004 BJS Census of Federal Law Enforcement Officers, collectively employed about 105,000 officers as of September 2004. This was about 13% more than in 2002.

Q. What are the duties of Federal law enforcement officers?
A. According to the 2004 Census, 38% primarily performed duties related to criminal investigation and enforcement, and 21% provided patrol and response services. Corrections and detention-related duties were performed by 16% of officers, and another 16% performed inspections duties related to customs and immigration laws.

Q. Which Federal agency employs the most officers?
A. As of September 2004, U.S. Customs and Border Protection in the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) was the largest agency with 27,705 personnel authorized to make arrests and carry firearms in the 50 States and the District of Columbia. Other agencies with at least 10,000 officers included two Justice Department agencies - the Federal Bureau of Prisons (15,214) and the FBI (12,242) - and another DHS agency, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (10,399).

Q. What is the representation of women and minorities among Federal officers?
A. In 2004, women accounted for about a sixth of Federal officers. A third were members of a racial or ethnic minority. This included about 18% who were Hispanic or Latino, and 11% who were black or African American.

Q. Relative to the population, how many Federal officers are there? Which States have the most officers? Which States have the fewest?
A. Nationwide there were 36 Federal officers with arrest and firearm authority for every 100,000 U.S. residents. Outside the District of Columbia which had 1,662 officers per 100,000 residents, State ratios ranged from 90 per 100,000 in Arizona, to 7 per 100,000 in Iowa. In actual numbers Texas (14,633) and California (13,365) had the most Federal officers while New Hampshire and Delaware, with 112 each, had the fewest.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of BJS Publication

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of Violent Felons in Large Urban Counties (NCJ 205289), by Brian Reaves of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Violent Felons in Large Urban Counties presents data collected from a representative sample of felony cases that resulted in a felony conviction for a violent offense in 40 of the Nation's 75 largest counties. The study tracks cases for up to 1 year from the date of filing through final disposition. Defendants convicted of murder, rape, robbery, assault or other violent felonies are described in terms of demographic characteristics (gender, race, Hispanic origin, age), prior arrests and convictions, criminal justice status at time of arrest, type of pretrial release or detention, type of adjudication, and sentence received. Highlights include the following:

- From 1990 to 2002, 18% of felony convictions in the 75 largest counties were for violent offenses, including 7% for assault and 6% for robbery.

• Six percent of those convicted of violent felonies were under age 18, and 25% were under age 21. Ten percent of murderers were under 18, and 30% were under 21.

• Thirty-six percent of violent felons had an active criminal justice status at the time of their arrest. This included 18% on probation, 12% on release pending disposition of a prior case, and 7% on parole.

• Seventy percent of violent felons had a prior arrest record, and 57% had at least one prior arrest for a felony. Sixty-seven percent of murderers and 73% of those convicted of robbery or assault had an arrest record.

• A majority (56%) of violent felons had a prior conviction record. Thirty-eight percent had a prior felony conviction and 15% had a previous conviction for a violent felony.

• Forty-one percent of murder convictions occurred at a trial rather than through a guilty plea. Trials accounted for 12% of rape and robbery convictions and 11% of assault convictions.

• Eighty-one percent of violent felons were sentenced to incarceration with 50% going to prison and 31% to jail. Nineteen percent received a probation term without incarceration.

• Median prison sentences received included a maximum of 240 months for murder, 120 months for rape, 60 months for robbery, and 48 months for other violent felonies.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination at the time of the press release. When printed, this report will be distributed to criminal justice practitioners, policymakers, and others who have indicated an interest in this subject. We have consulted with the OJP Office of Communications, and they have made preliminary plans to issue a press release.

TIMETABLE: The press release is anticipated for Sunday, August 6, 2006, at 4:30 p.m. EDT. BJS will begin distributing this publication at that time.

Violent Felons in Large Urban Counties

Q. What violent offenders does this report cover?

A. The report presents analyses covering a sample of 9,000 convicted violent felons representing 33,000 cases from State courts in the 75 largest counties. These cases were selected during seven separate studies conducted in even-numbered years from 1990 through 2002. A sample of felony cases filed during the month of May was selected in each of these years. They were included in the analyses as long as they resulted in the defendant being convicted of a violent felony.

Q. What proportion of violent crimes are committed by youthful offenders?

A. Six percent of violent felons in the 75 largest counties were under the age of 18, and 25% were under the age of 21. Ten percent of murderers were under the age of 18, and 30% were under 21.

Q. Is it true that many violent crimes are committed by repeat offenders?

A. Thirty-six percent of violent felons had an active criminal justice status at the time of their arrest. This included 18% on probation, 12% on release pending disposition of a prior case, and 7% on parole. Seventy percent had a prior arrest record, and 56% had a conviction record. Thirty-eight percent had at least 1 prior felony conviction, and 15% had been previously convicted of a violent felony.

Q. Do persons convicted of a violent felony typically receive a prison sentence?

A. Overall, 50% of those convicted of a violent felony received a prison sentence, and another 31% received a jail sentence. Nearly all (96%) murderers were sentenced to prison. A majority of those convicted of robbery (69%) or rape (62%) were sentenced to prison as well. About a fifth of rape and robbery sentences were to jail. For those convicted of felony assault, equal percentages (38%) were sentenced to prison and jail. Nearly all violent felons not sentenced to incarceration received a probation term.

Q. How long are the prison sentences for violent felons?

A. The median sentence length was 20 years for murderers, 10 years for rape, 5 years for robbery, and 4 years for assault.

SUBJECT: Advance Notification of BJS Publication

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of Sexual Violence Reported by Correctional Authorities, 2005 (NCJ 214646), by Allen Beck and Paige Harrison of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Sexual Violence Reported by Correctional Authorities, 2005 presents data from the Survey on Sexual Violence, 2005, an administrative records collection of incidents of inmate-on-inmate and staff-on-inmate sexual violence reported to correctional authorities. The report provides counts of sexual violence by type and includes tables on reporting capabilities, how investigations are handled, and characteristics of victims and perpetrators of sexual violence. In 2005, the survey was expanded to collect detailed information on substantiated incidents, including the circumstances surrounding each incident, characteristics of victims and perpetrators, the type of pressure or coercion, victim injuries, sanctions imposed, and victim assistance. The appendix tables include counts of sexual violence, by type, for the 1,867 facilities included in the survey. The report also includes an update on BJS activities related to implementation of the data collections required under the Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003 (Public Law 108-79). Highlights include the following:

- 6,241 allegations of sexual violence in prison and jail reported in 2005, up from 5,386 in 2004. 38% of allegations involved staff sexual misconduct; 35%, inmate-on-inmate nonconsensual sexual acts; 17%, staff sexual harassment; and 10%, abusive sexual contact.

• Correctional authorities reported 2.83 allegations of sexual violence per 1,000 inmates in 2005, up from 2.46 in 2004.

• Correctional authorities substantiated 885 incidents of sexual violence in 2005, 15% of completed investigations. There were an estimated 0.40 substantiated incidents of sexual violence per 1,000 inmates in 2005, down from the 0.55 recorded in 2004.

• Based on completed investigations only, 37% of allegations of staff sexual misconduct in local jails and 15% in State prisons were substantiated.

• Half of inmate-on-inmate sexual violence involved physical force or threat of force; two-thirds of staff misconduct was romantic. In prisons 67% of the victims involved in staff sexual misconduct were male, while 62% of the perpetrators were female. In jails 78% of victims of staff sexual misconduct were female; 87% of the perpetrators, male.

• Staff were arrested or prosecuted in 45% of substantiated incidents of staff sexual misconduct; discharged, fired or resigned in 82%.

COORDINATION: The Census Bureau of the U.S. Department of Commerce assisted with data collection and processing of the survey.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination at the time of the press release. When printed, this report will be distributed to criminal justice practitioners, policymakers, and others who have indicated an interest in this subject. We have consulted with the OJP Office of Communications, and they have made preliminary plans to issue a press release.

TIMETABLE: The press release is anticipated for Sunday, July 30, 2006, at 4:30 p.m. EDT. BJS will begin distributing this publication at that time.

Sexual Violence Reported by Correctional Authorities, 2005

Presents data from the Survey on Sexual Violence, 2005, an administrative records collection of incidents of inmate-on-inmate and staff-on-inmate sexual violence reported to correctional authorities. The report provides counts of sexual violence in all State prison systems, the Federal prison system, and a sample of privately-operated and local jail facilities, by type of violence. The 2005 survey also collected individual level data on substantiated incidents, which expands our knowledge on the characteristics of the victims, perpetrators, and circumstances of sexual assault incidents. Finally, the report also includes an update on activities related to implementation of the data collections required under the Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003 (Public Law 108-79). The publication of this report is mandated by statute and is prepared on June 30 of each year. Data on sexual violence as reported to the juvenile justice authorities will be published later this year.

1. What is the Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003?

- The Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003 was signed into law on September 4, 2003, by President George W. Bush. The Act establishes a zero-tolerance policy for inmate-on-inmate and staff-on-inmate sexual violence in correctional facilities.
- Under the Act, the Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS) is required to conduct an annual data collection to measure the incidence and prevalence of sexual violence in at least 10% of the Nation's 5,220 adult correctional facilities and 3,470 juvenile facilities. This includes State and Federal prisons, local jails, private adult correctional facilities, jails in Indian Country, facilities operated by the U.S. Military or by the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, State juvenile facilities, and local and private juvenile facilities.
- BJS is required to submit a report to Congress on June 30 of each year on the activities related to the Act for the preceding year and to provide a listing of institutions ranked according to the incidence of sexual violence.

2. How is sexual violence measured?

- Incidents of inmate-on-inmate sexual violence were separated into two categories: nonconsensual sexual acts and abusive sexual contacts. Incidents of staff-on-inmate sexual violence were categorized into staff sexual misconduct and staff sexual harassment.
- Most correctional systems and facilities were able to report information on the most serious incidents of sexual violence.
- Additional information was collected on substantiated incidents, including victim and perpetrator characteristics, time and place of incident, and actions taken following the report.

3. How extensive is sexual violence in the Nation's correctional facilities?

- During 2005 an estimated 6,241 allegations of sexual violence were reported by correctional authorities -- the equivalent of 2.8 allegations per 1,000 inmates, up from 2.5 per 1,000 inmates in prison, jails, and other adult correctional facilities in 2004.
- State and Federal prison systems reported 74% of all allegations; local jails, 22%.
- Approximately 38% of the reported allegations of sexual violence involved staff-on-inmate sexual misconduct; 35% involved inmate-on-inmate nonconsensual sexual acts; 17% staff sexual harassment of inmates; and 10% inmate-on-inmate abusive sexual contacts.

4. What additional information is learned from the 2005 survey?

- Correctional authorities substantiated 885 incidents of sexual violence in 2005, 15% of completed investigations.
- Relative to the number of inmates, there were 0.40 substantiated incidents of sexual violence per 1,000 inmates reported in 2005, down from 0.55 per 1,000 inmates in adult facilities in 2004.
- Half of inmate-on-inmate incidents of sexual violence involved physical force or threat of force.
- In more than two-thirds of inmate-on-inmate incidents, the sexual violence occurred in the victim's cell or living area. In only 20% of the incidents did the violence occur in a common area, such as a shower or dayroom.
- Victims received physical injuries in 15% of substantiated incidents of inmate-on-inmate sexual violence. Victims received medical attention, counseling or mental health treatment in two-thirds of the incidents of nonconsensual sexual acts.
- Half of the victims of nonconsensual sexual acts were placed in protective custody or administrative segregation.
- In half of the incidents of inmate-on-inmate sexual violence, the perpetrators were arrested or referred for prosecution; in more than two-thirds of the incidents, the perpetrator was placed in solitary confinement.

5. What is learned about staff sexual misconduct and harassment in prisons and jails?

- Two-thirds of incidents of staff sexual misconduct with inmates were reported to be romantic in nature. Fewer than 15% of the substantiated incidents involved physical force, abuse of power or pressure by staff.
- In State prison and Federal prisons 67% of the victims of staff misconduct were male; while 62% of the perpetrators were female. In local jails 78% of the victims were female; 87% of the perpetrators, male.
- Most substantiated incidents of staff sexual misconduct and harassment involved correctional officers (69%). About 13% of the incidents involved contract employees or vendors.
- Nearly 90% of the perpetrators of staff misconduct were arrested, referred for prosecution or discharged.
- In incidents involving a romantic relationship between inmate and staff, more than half of the inmates were either transferred to another facility or placed in administrative segregation.

6. When will the other PREA data collections be implemented?

- The National Inmate Survey of Sexual Assault, an ACASI self-report instrument designed for adult prisons and jails, has completed the testing stage, and BJS and RTI staff are analyzing the results (report of pretest results will be issued in September). National implementation in 120 prisons and 330 jails, with a yield of 60,000 interviews, will begin in November, 2006. Results from the survey will be included in the report to Congress on June 30, 2007.
- The National Survey of Sexual Assault in Juvenile Facilities, an ACASI self-report instrument designed for youth, is currently undergoing cognitive testing and will be fully tested in 10 facilities with up to 600 youth is planned for September 2006. Full national implementation in up to 180 juvenile facilities (with 14,000 adjudicated youth) is expected in 2007.

- The National Survey of Sexual Assault Reported by Former Inmates, an ACASI self-report instrument designed for former inmates under active supervision, will undergo pretesting in 10-20 parole offices in fall 2006. National implementation is expected to occur in 285 parole offices (with up to 11,500 interviews) in 2007.
- National Prison Rape Surveillance Project, a collection using medical indicators as an additional measure of sexual violence, is currently being developed in partnership with the National Institute of Justice and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with advance copies and notification of the pending publication of Prosecutors in State Courts, 2005 (NCJ 213799), by Steven W. Perry of BJS.

DISCUSSION: Prosecutors in State Courts, 2005 presents findings from the 2005 National Survey of Prosecutors, the latest in a series of data collections from among the Nation's 2,300 State court prosecutors' offices that tried felony cases in State courts of general jurisdiction. This study provides information on the number of staff, annual budget, and felony cases closed for each office. Information is also available on the use of DNA evidence, computer-related crimes, and terrorism cases prosecuted. Other survey data include special categories of felony offenses prosecuted, types of non-felony cases handled, number of felony convictions, number of juvenile cases proceeded against in criminal court, and work-related threats or assaults against office staff. Highlights include the following:

• At least two-thirds of the State court prosecutors had litigated a computer-related crime such as credit card fraud (80%), identity theft (69%), or transmission of child pornography (67%).

• Nearly all the prosecutors' offices (98%) reported their State had a domestic violence statute; 28% of the offices maintained a domestic violence prosecution unit.

• A quarter (24%) of the offices participated in a State or local task force for homeland security; one-third reported an office member attended training on homeland security issues.

• Most prosecutors (95%) relied on State operated forensic laboratories to perform DNA analysis, with about a third (34%) also using privately operated DNA labs.

• Two-thirds of prosecutors' offices had prosecuted a juvenile case in criminal court during 2005. A third of the offices had a designated attorney for these special cases.

• In 2005, nearly 40% of the prosecutors considered their office a community prosecution site actively involving law enforcement and the community to improve public safety.

COORDINATION: The Bureau of Justice Statistics coordinated with the following entities, who performed data collection and processing, pre-testing, non-response, and/or reviewed the report: the National Opinion Research Center (NORC) at the University of Chicago, the National District Attorneys Association (NDAA), the Prosecutor Coordinator Offices in each State, and the Office of Research & Evaluation for the American Prosecutors Research Institute.

DISSEMINATION: The text and data tabulations will be made available on the Internet for instantaneous dissemination upon release. When printed, this report will be distributed to criminal justice practitioners, policymakers, and others who have indicated an interest in this subject.

TIMETABLE: BJS will make this publication available in late July, in preparation for the National District Attorneys Association Summer Conference in Santa Fe, New Mexico, July 30 – August 2, 2006.

First Estimates from the National Crime Victimization Survey

Identity Theft, 2004

By Katrina Baum, Ph.D.
BJS Statistician

In 2004, 3.6 million households, representing 3% of the households in the United States, discovered that at least one member of the household had been the victim of identity theft during the previous 6 months. The households most likely to experience identity theft —

- earned $75,000 or more
- were headed by persons ages 18-24
- were in urban or suburban areas.

These findings represent 6-month prevalence estimates and are drawn from interviews conducted from July to December 2004 for the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS). (See Methodology).

For the NCVS, identity theft was defined to include three behaviors (see Appendix) —

- unauthorized use or attempted use of existing credit cards
- unauthorized use or attempted use of other existing accounts such as checking accounts
- misuse of personal information to obtain new accounts or loans, or to commit other crimes.

Estimates in this report are drawn from interviews with knowledgeable respondents age 18 or older in each sample household about discoveries of identity theft of anyone in their household during the previous 6 months.

Highlights

In 2004, 1 in 33 households discovered at least one type of identity theft during the previous 6 months

Did households discover identity theft in previous 6 months?	Number of households	Percent of households	Percent of victimized households
Yes	3,589,100	3.0%	100.0%
Unauthorized use of:
Existing credit cards	1,736,700	1.5	48.4
Other existing accounts	896,500	0.8	25.0
Misuse of personal information	538,700	0.5	15.0
Multiple types of theft during the same episode	417,100	0.3	11.6
No	111,773,400	93.8%	--
Don't know	261,800	0.2%	--

- Credit card theft was the most common type of identity theft (1.5% of households).
- Households headed by persons age 18-24 and those in the highest income bracket ($75,000 or more) were the most likely to experience identity theft.
- Rural households were less likely than urban or suburban households to have a member experience identity theft (2% versus 4% and 3%, respectively).
- 3 in 10 households experiencing any type of identity theft discovered it by missing money or noticing unfamiliar charges on an account; almost 1 in 4 were contacted by a credit bureau.
- Overall a third of households experienced one or more problems as the result of the episode of identity theft.
- The most common problems encountered included being contacted by a debt collector or creditor, banking problems, or problems with credit card accounts.
- 1 in 5 of victimized households with problems spent at least one month resolving problems.
- Credit card thefts were the least likely among identity thefts to still be causing problems at the time of the interview to the victims or their households (9%).
- The estimated loss as a result of identity theft was about $3.2 billion.
- About two-thirds of households experiencing identity theft reported some type of a monetary loss as a result of theft.

DOJ_NMG_0143272

Characteristics of identity theft

About 6% of households experiencing identity theft during the 6-month reference period reported that they experienced multiple episodes. If more than one episode was discovered during the previous 6 months, the characteristics of the most recent episode are discussed.

Number of episodes	Number	Percent of households

Awareness

Almost a third of households experiencing any type of identity theft discovered it by missing money or noticing unfamiliar charges on an account (table 2). One in five victimized households were contacted by a credit bureau, and 1 in 9 became aware of the theft as a result of having banking problems. About 1 in 18 households experiencing identity theft discovered the theft as the result of noticing an error in a credit report.

The way in which members of a household experiencing identify theft discovered the theft varied by type of theft. Households experiencing theft of other existing accounts were more likely than households with credit card theft, personal information theft, or multiple types of theft at the same time to discover the theft by missing money or noticing charges on an account (42% versus 31%, 8%, and 30%).

Households with credit card thefts were equally likely to have missed money/noticed charges on an account or have been contacted by a credit company or bureau (31% and 31%, respectively). Almost a fifth of households experiencing theft of personal information discovered it by being contacted by a credit bureau.

Table 2. How victim became aware of identity theft, by type of identity theft

	Percent of thefts involving–
How theft was discovered	Total	Existing credit cards	Other existing accounts	Personal information	Multiple types of theft during the same episode
Block placed on account	3.8%	4.5%	3.3%	1.0%*	5.3%*
Missing money or noticed charges on account	30.4	31.2	42.1	7.9	29.5
Contacted by credit bureau	22.8	30.7	9.0	18.6	25.2
Banking problems	10.8	11.8	11.7	6.2	10.7
Noticed credit card or checkbook was missing	6.2	5.9	7.7	1.5*	9.7
Notified by police	1.1	0.4*	0.6*	3.8*	1.7*
Denied phone or utility service	2.4	0.1*	4.4	3.7*	5.7*
Noticed an error in credit report	5.6	4.4	3.0*	13.0	6.7*
Other way	28.6	19.3	35.2	49.0	27.5

Note: Table excludes 1% of households victimized by identity theft that did not provide an answer to how they became aware of the identity theft.
*Estimate based on 10 or fewer cases.

Problems experienced

Overall a third of households that experienced identity theft reported they experienced one or more problems as the result of the theft.

	Percent of households experiencing identity theft
No problems	66.7%
Any problem	33.3%

Note: Table excludes 39% of households who did not provide an answer to whether or not they experienced problems as a result of the identity theft.

Among households that had problems, households were equally likely to have been contacted by a debt collector or have banking problems (34% versus 31%) (table 3). They were somewhat more likely to be contacted by a debt collector than they were to have problems with their credit card accounts (34% versus 26%).

About 1 in 6 victimized households had to pay higher interest rates as the result of the identity theft, and 1 in 9 households were denied phone or utility service. Households were equally likely to be turned down for insurance or pay higher rates, be the subject of a civil suit or judgment, or be the subject of a criminal investigation (7%, 5%, and 4%, respectively). About a fifth of households reported they experienced some other kind of problem.

Table 3. Problems experienced as a result of identity theft

Types of problems	Percent of households experiencing problems due to identity theft
Contacted by a debt collector or creditor	34.1%
Banking problems	30.5
Problems with credit card accounts	25.8
Had to pay higher interest rates	15.4
Denied phone or utility service	11.5
Turned down or had to pay higher insurance rates	6.7
Subject of a civil suit or judgment	4.6
Subject of criminal investigation	4.4
Had some other problems	17.8

Note: Respondents could select more than one type of problem.

Economic loss

The estimated loss as a result of identity theft was about $3.2 billion (not referenced in a table).[3] Although 6% of the victimized households reported more than one theft, information about the characteristics of identity theft including loss is based on only the most recent episode and of those who provided a dollar amount. The losses reported include money that may have been reimbursed by others such as credit card companies or insurance companies and exclude such things as costs associated with paying higher interest rates and wages lost from time spent clearing up problems associated with the theft. It is possible that households for which misuse was still ongoing at the time of the interview may have continued to suffer losses after the interview.

Most households incurred a monetary loss as a result of the identity theft. Of the households experiencing identity theft —

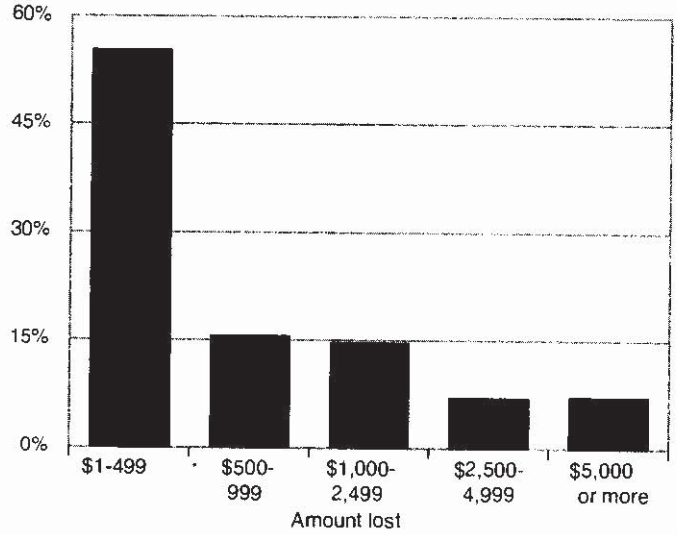
- 69.2% reported a monetary loss
- 17.1% reported no loss
- 13.8% did not know the amount of the loss.

Households experiencing misuse of personal information were more likely than other types of households to have no money involved (33% versus 14%, 16%, and 10%) (table 6). About a sixth of households experiencing thefts of existing credits cards or other existing accounts reported no money was involved in the theft.

Fifteen percent of households experiencing any type of identity theft sustained losses of at least $1 but less than $100. Households experiencing thefts of existing credit cards or other existing accounts were equally likely to sustain losses in this range (18% and 19%).

Overall, 1 in 20 households reported $5,000 or more was involved. Households experiencing multiple types of theft at the same time were more likely than those with thefts of existing credit cards or misuse of personal information to have $5,000 or more involved (12% versus 5% and 5%). Similar proportions of households experiencing thefts of existing credit cards or misuse of personal information sustained losses of $5,000 or more (5% and 5%).

Among households actually sustaining a loss and for which the amount of the loss was known, over half (55%) reported less than $500 was involved (figure 2). Three in ten of the victimized households that sustained a loss reported the amount of money involved was between $500 to $2,499.



[3]Estimate does not include all losses as a result of identity theft. For example, costs or losses to businesses as a result of identity theft are not included.

Crime and the Nation's Households, 2004

Crime and the Nation's Households, 2004 is an annual BJS report presenting national prevalence estimates for the percentage of households who were victimized by crime as measured by the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS). Analyses provide household prevalence estimates for violent and property crimes and information on those households experiencing vandalism and intimate partner violence. The report provides comparisons with 2003 victimization data, as well as overall trends since 1994.

1. How does this measure of crime differ from the annual reports on the rate of criminal victimization?

This report complements the earlier report entitled "Criminal Victimization, 2004" (CV04). The CV04 report represents an annual measure of the incidence of criminal victimization answering those questions related to the number of times certain measured crimes occur and which individuals are the most vulnerable to criminal victimization. This report, by contrast, provides a measure of the extent to which households may have members who became victims of crime – it provides a sense of the magnitude of the impact of criminal victimization since crime may affect all members of a household regardless of how many in the household became crime victims or how often it occurred. The data in this report are based upon the number and percentage of U.S. households in which a victim reported 1 or more crimes during the year. For example, if a household experienced 2 household burglaries and 3 simple assaults during the year, each of these crimes would be counted in CV04. In this report, the household would be counted once as having experienced crime of some type during the year, once as having experienced one or more household burglaries and once as having a member or members who experienced simple assault.

2. What are the major findings of this report?

In 2004, 14% of the households in the United States, accounting for 16 million households, experienced 1 or more violent or property crimes as measured by the NCVS. This represents a decline from 25% in 1994. In 2004, 3% of households had a member age 12 or older who was the victim of at least one violent crime, down from 7% in 1994. There were no significant changes in the percentage of households experiencing crime between 2003 and 2004.

3. Why is vandalism included in this report and not in the annual report on criminal victimization?

Vandalism in NCVS is measured as a prevalence measure because an entire household is usually considered the victim of vandalism. In 2004, 4.8% of households experienced 1 or more vandalism incidents. If vandalism were included in the overall measure of households experiencing crime, the total percentage of households experiencing crime would rise from 14% to 17%.

4. How many households experienced intimate partner violence? Crimes by strangers?

Intimate partner violence affected about 1 in 250 households during 2004. These households represented less than 1% of all U.S. households, with members age 12 or older. The prevalence of households affected by intimate partner violence declined from 1994 to 2004.

In 2004, about 1 in every 27 U.S. households reported that a household member had been a victim of violence by a stranger or the household had experienced a burglary. These crimes declined from 1994, but did not change between 2003 and 2004.

5. Which types of households are most affected by crime?

In 2004, households headed by blacks (16%) and Hispanics (17%) were more vulnerable to crime than those headed by whites (14%) or non-Hispanics (14%). The prevalence of crime was higher for urban households (18%), large households, and those in the West (18%). The household prevalence indicator is very sensitive to household size — twenty-five percent of households with six or more persons experienced crime, compared with 9% of one-person households and 14% of households with two or three persons.

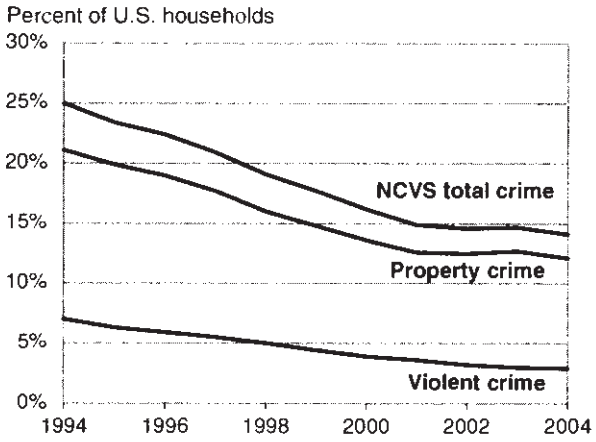
National Crime Victimization Survey

Crime and the Nation's Households, 2004

By Patsy Klaus
BJS Statistician



In 2004, 14% of households in the United States, accounting for 16 million households, experienced 1 or more violent or property victimizations as measured by the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS). These crimes include rape/sexual assault, robbery, aggravated and simple assault, purse snatching or pocket picking, household burglary, motor vehicle theft, and property theft.

In 2004, 3% of households had a member age 12 or older who experienced one or more violent crimes. Simple assault was the type of violent crime sustained by most households. Twelve percent of of households experienced one or more property crimes, with theft the most widely sustained. There were no real differences between 2003 and 2004 in the percentage of households experiencing total crimes.

Both violent and property crime declined between 1994 and 2004. The percentage of U.S. households experiencing one or more crimes dropped from 25% in 1994 to 14% in 2004.

Highlights

The percentage of U.S. households experiencing one or more crimes dropped from 25% in 1994 to 14% in 2004

- Both violent and property crimes declined between 1994 and 2004.
- Households with at least one member who experienced a violent crime declined from 7% in 1994 to 3% in 2004.
- Households experiencing property crimes declined from 21% in 1994 to 12% in 2004.
- In 2004 about 16 million households experienced one or more property crimes or had a member age 12 or older who experienced one or more violent crimes.
- About 1 in every 27 households in 2004 were either burglarized or had a member age 12 or older who was a victim of a violent crime committed by a stranger. The portion of households affected by these crimes has fallen since 1994, but did not change between 2003 and 2004.
- In 2004 about 1 in 250 households included a member victimized by a intimate partner, such as a spouse, ex-spouse, boyfriend, or girlfriend.
- About 5% of households had at least one incident of vandalism in 2004. Over 5.6 million households were vandalized during this period.

Theft	11,169,800	9.6

Note: Detail does not add to total or crime subtotals because of overlap in households experiencing various crimes. There were a total of 115,775,572 households in 2004. If vandalism is included among the victimizations, a total of 20,259,649 households (17.5%) experienced at least one crime in 2004.
*Violent crime does not include homicide.

Fourteen percent of U.S. households experienced one or more crimes in 2004

About 16 million households experienced 1 or more of the victimizations measured by the NCVS, an ongoing household survey that collects information about crimes both unreported and reported to police. These victimized households made up about 14% of the 115.8 million households in the United States.

Crime	Percent of households
	2003	2004
Any NCVS	14.7%	14.1%
Violent	3.0	2.9
Property	12.7	12.1

About 3% of households had an adolescent or adult member who was victimized by one or more crimes of violence during the year. NCVS interviews all members of a household age 12 or older and does not estimate victimizations of children younger than 12. The measured violent crimes, which include rape, sexual assault, robbery and simple and aggravated assault, affected members of about 1 in every 34 U.S. households. There were no significant changes in violent crimes in any of the categories between 2003 and 2004. About 2.3 million households had members who experienced simple assault, the most frequently encountered crime of violence. Simple assault does not result in serious injury and does not involve a weapon.

About 12% of all households in 2004 experienced one or more property crimes, such as household burglary, motor vehicle theft or property theft. Theft, affecting 1 in 10 households, was the most frequently encountered property crime. There was some evidence that the percentage of households victimized by overall property crime decreased between 2003 and 2004. There was no change for household burglary, motor vehicle theft or property theft for these years.

Few households experienced the same type of crime more than once

For the households-victimized-by-crime measure, households that experienced the same type of crime more than once were counted only once for that victimization.

In 2004, about 1% of households had members victimized by more than one type of violence, including rape, sexual assault, robbery, and assault. About 1% of households were victimized by both violent and property crimes. Such households were counted once in the violent crime measure, once in the property crime measure, and once in the overall measure.

Vandalism of residences or other property owned by an individual remains unchanged

Over 5.6 million households, 4.8% of all U.S. households had at least one incident of vandalism in 2004. First compiled by the NCVS in 2000, vandalism is not included in the overall measure of households experiencing victimization. If vandalism is included in the overall measure, the total percentage of households experiencing crime increases from 14% to 17%. There was no change in the percentage of households affected by vandalism between 2003 and 2004.

"Crimes of high concern" were experienced by 4% of households

Violence by strangers or household burglary are often cited as the most fear provoking crimes. The portion of these crimes has fallen since 1994 but did not change between 2003 and 2004. About 1 in every 27 households experienced household burglary or had a household member who experienced violence by a stranger during 2004 (figure 1). About 4.3 million households experienced these "crimes of high concern" in 2004.

Intimate partner violence affected about 1 in 250 households during 2004

Less than 1% of all households experienced intimate partner violence, which is violence committed by a current or former spouse, boyfriend, or girlfriend (figure 2). Intimate partner violence declined between 1994 and 2004, but did not change between 2003 and 2004. One or more members of about 458,000 households experienced at least one intimate partner victimization during 2004.

Black and Hispanic households were more vulnerable to crime

In 2004 households headed by blacks were more likely to experience crime (16%) than those headed by whites (14%) (table 2). Households headed by Hispanics were more likely to sustain one or more crimes than those headed by non-Hispanics (17% vs. 14%).

Intimate partner violence	0.4%	0.6%	0.1%	0.5%

Note: Beginning in 2003, multiple race entries were allowed. White refers to a household head who listed only white as racial background; black refers to those listing only black. Other race heads of household were Asians, American Indians, Alaska Natives, Native Hawaiians, or Pacific Islanders reporting a single racial background. Murder and vandalism are not measured in this table.

Intimate partner violence	0.5	0.3	0.5

Note: Murder and vandalism are not measured in this table.

Prevalence of crime was higher for urban households, large households, and those in the West

Households in urban areas (18%) were more likely to experience one or more crimes than suburban households (13%) and rural households (12%) in 2004 (table 3).

Household size affected the likelihood of experiencing criminal victimization in 2004 (table 4). Twenty-five percent of households with six or more persons experienced one or more crimes compared with 20% of households made up of four or five persons, 14% of households with two or three persons, and 9% of one-person households.

Households located in the West were more likely to experience one or more crimes when compared with households in other regions of the country.

Prevalence of crime in households decreased from 1994 to 2004

About 14% of households experienced one or more crimes in 2004, compared to about 25% households in 1994 (table 5). The percentage of households experiencing either violent or property crime also declined. In 2004, about 3% of households had a member who experienced at least one violent crime, compared with 7% in 1994. For property crimes, 12% of households were affected in 2004, compared to 21% in 1994.

Methodology

This Bulletin presents data on non-lethal violence and property crimes from the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS). In 2004, 84,360 households and 149,000 individuals age 12 or older were interviewed. For the 2004 NCVS data presented here, the response rate was 91.3% of eligible households and 85.5% of eligible individuals.

The households-victimized-by-crime measure counts each household once for the calendar year, regardless of the number of times a household experienced a particular type of crime. For the overall indicator, household-based crime estimates are derived from NCVS statistics on rape/sexual assault, robbery, assault, personal theft, household burglary, household theft, and motor vehicle theft. A household is counted if anyone in the household experienced one or more of any of these crimes within the year. For categories such as violent crime by a stranger or intimate partner crime, a household is counted if person(s) in the households were victimized one or more times by that particular type of crime.

Detailed information about the construction of the households-victimized-by-crime measure, as well as data about households in prior years, is available in Crime and the Nation's Households, 2000, with Trends, 1994-2000 <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/abstract/cnh00.htm>. Survey of State Criminal History Information Systems, 2003
(SEARCH Group Inc.) Describes the status of State criminal history records systems at yearend 2003. The data presented are used as the basis for estimating the percentage of total State records that are immediately available through the FBI's Interstate Identification Index and the percentage that include dispositions. Other data presented include the number of records maintained by each State, the percentage of automated records in the system, and the number of States participating in the FBI's Interstate Identification Index. The publication also contains information regarding the timeliness of data in State record systems, and procedures employed to improve data quality. The report is an update of Survey of State Criminal History Information Systems, 2001, released in September 2003, and is the eighth in the series that began with 1989 data. Expected release around 03/02/2006.

Yes Identity Theft, 2004

(K. Baum) Presents data on identity theft victimization and its consequences from the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS). This is the first report from new questions about identity theft added to the survey in July 2004 and encompasses credit card thefts, thefts from existing accounts, misuse of personal information, and multiple types at the same time. The report, based on interviews with 40,000 household residents drawn to be nationally representative, describes age, race, and ethnicity of the household head; household income; and location of the household (urbanicity). Characteristics of the theft presented include economic loss, how the theft was discovered, whether misuse is ongoing, and problems experienced as a result of the identity theft. Expected release around 03/15/2006.

Crime and the Nation's Households, 2004

(P. Klaus) Presents information on the percentage of households or persons in households who are victimized as measured by the National Crime Victimization Survey. Findings are presented by region; by urban, suburban or rural location; and by household size. This annual report also includes overall trends since 1994, vandalism, and intimate partner violence. Expected release around 03/31/2006.

Improving Criminal History Records for Background Checks, 2005

(G. Ramker) Describes the achievements of the National Criminal History Improvement Program (NCHIP), its authorizing legislation and program history. This annual Bulletin summarizes NCHIP-funded criminal record improvement efforts, including improved accessibility of records, full participation in the Interstate Identification Index, the automation of records and fingerprint data, and improvements in the National Instant Criminal Background Check, National Sex Offender Registry, and domestic violence and protection order systems. The report provides examples of projects aimed at enhancing the involvement of the courts and system integration in improving disposition reporting. The report also discusses the Bureau of Justice Statistics' efforts to improve performance measurement including the development and use of a Records Quality Index. Expected release around 03/31/2006.

(E. Smith, M. Durose) Presents data on the nature and characteristics of traffic stops, as collected in the 2002 Police Public Contact Survey, a supplement to the National Crime Victimization Survey. Detailed demographic information is presented on the 16.8

million drivers stopped by police in 2002. The report provides statistics about various outcomes of traffic stops, including searches conducted by police, tickets issued to drivers stopped for speeding, arrests of stopped drivers, and police use of force during a traffic stop. The report also discusses the relevance of the survey findings to the issue of racial profiling and provides comparative analysis with prior survey findings. Expected release around 04/15/2006.

Justice Expenditure and Employment in the United States, 2003

(K. Hughes) Provides selected data from the U.S. Census Bureau's Annual General Finance and Employment Surveys. Data presented include police protection, judicial and legal services, and corrections expenditure and employment for Federal, State, and local governments in 2003 and national trend data for 1982 to 2003. Expenditure data are provided for fiscal year 2003; employment and payroll data are for the month of March 2003. The report compares justice expenditure to spending for other governmental services and analyzes trends in justice spending and employment. It also presents per capita employment data relative to other State and government services, as well as per capita expenditure data by governmental function. Expected release date around 04/15/2006.

Local Police Departments, 2003

(M. Hickman, B. Reaves) Presents data collected from a representative sample of local police departments nationwide on a variety of agency characteristics based on the 2003 Law Enforcement Management and Administrative Statistics (LEMAS) survey. National estimates for local police departments are provided for such issues as staff and financial resources, technologies and equipment in use, and policies and practices of the agencies on a wide array of law enforcement and administrative concerns. Expected release around 04/15/2006.

Sheriffs' Offices, 2003

(M. Hickman, B. Reaves) Presents data collected from a representative sample of sheriffs' offices nationwide on a variety of agency characteristics based on the 2003 LEMAS survey. National estimates for sheriffs' offices are provided for such issues as staff and financial resources, technologies and equipment in use, and agency policies and practices covering a wide array of law enforcement and administrative concerns. Expected release date around 04/15/2006.

Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003

(M. Motivans) Presents data on Federal criminal justice trends from 1994-2003. This report summarizes the activities of agencies at each stage of the Federal criminal case process. It includes 10-year trend statistics on the number arrested (with detail on drug offenses); number and disposition of suspects investigated by U.S. attorneys; number of persons detained prior to trial; number of defendants in cases filed, convicted, and sentenced; and number of offenders under Federal correctional supervision (incarceration, supervised release, probation, and parole). Expected release around 04/30/2006.

National Corrections Reporting Program, 2002 CD-ROM

(T. Hughes, A. Beck) Presents data on admissions, releases, and parole outcomes of persons in the Nation's State prisons and parole systems, including demographic characteristics, offenses, sentence length, type of admission, time to be served, method of release, and actual time served of inmates exiting prison and parole. In 2002, 39 States reported data. Included on the CD-ROM are ASCII files that require the use of specific statistical software packages, a code book, statistical software setup files, and explanatory notes. Expected release date around 04/30/2006.

Prison and Jail Inmates, Midyear 2005

(P. Harrison, A. Beck) Presents data on prison and jail inmates, collected from National Prisoner Statistics counts and the Annual Survey of Jails in 2005. This annual report provides for each State and the Federal system, the number of inmates and the overall incarceration rate per 100,000 residents. It offers trends since 1995 and percentage changes in prison populations since midyear and yearend 2004. The midyear report presents the number of prison inmates held in private facilities and the number of prisoners under 18 years of age held by State correctional authorities. It includes total numbers for prison and jail inmates by gender, race, and Hispanic origin as well as counts of jail inmates by conviction status and confinement status. The report also provides findings on rated capacity of local jails, percent of capacity occupied, and capacity added. Standard errors for jail estimates are provided in the appendix tables of the electronic version of this report. Expected release date around 04/30/2006.

Violent Felons in Large Urban Counties: State Court Processing Statistics, 1990-2002

(B. Reaves) Presents data collected from a representative sample of felony cases that resulted in a felony conviction for a violent offense in 40 of the Nation's 75 largest counties. The study tracks cases for up to 1 year from the date of filing through final disposition. Defendants convicted of murder, rape, robbery, assault or other violent felony are described in terms of demographic characteristics (gender, race, Hispanic origin, age), prior arrests and convictions, criminal justice status at time of arrest, type of pretrial release or detention, type of adjudication, and sentence received. Expected release around 04/30/2006.

State Court Organization, 2004
(D. Rottman, S. Strickland, T. Cohen, BJS project monitor) Presents detailed comparative data by State trial and appellate courts in the United States. Topics covered include: the number of courts and judges; process for judicial selection; governance of court systems, including judicial funding, administration, staffing, and procedures; jury qualifications and verdict rules; and processing and sentencing procedures for criminal cases. Diagrams of court structure summarize the key features of each State's court organization. This fifth edition of State Court Organization is a joint effort of the Conference of State Court Administrators, the National Center for State Courts, and BJS. Expected release date around 05/01/2006.

Federal Law Enforcement Officers, 2004
(B. Reaves) Reports the results of a biennial census of Federal agencies employing personnel with arrest and firearms authority. Using agency classifications, the report presents the number of officers working in the areas of police patrol and response, criminal investigation and enforcement, security and protection, court operations, and corrections, by agency and State, as of September 2004. Data on gender and race of officers are also included. Expected release date around 05/15/2006.

Medical Problems of Jail Inmates, 2002
(L. Maruschak) Presents findings on jail inmates who reported a current medical problem, a physical impairment or mental condition, or an injury since admission based on data from the 2002 Survey of Inmates in Local Jails. The prevalence of specific medical problems and conditions are also included. The report examines medical problems and other conditions by gender, age, time served since admission, and select background characteristics. Expected release date around 05/15/2006.

Appeals from General Civil Trials in 46 Large Counties, 2001-2005
(T. Cohen) Presents information on general civil cases concluded by bench or jury trial in 2001 that were subsequently appealed to a State's intermediate appellate court or court of last resort. Information presented includes the flow of civil cases through the appeals process and the affect of appeals on trial court outcomes. The report describes the types of civil bench and jury trials appealed, the characteristics of litigants filing an appeal, the frequency in which appellate courts affirm, reverse, or modify trial court outcomes, and the percentage of appeals that produced a published opinion. Cases further appealed from an intermediate appellate court to a State court of last resort and the impact of that final level of appeal on litigation outcomes are also described. This report is part of a series examining civil litigation in the United States. Expected release date around 06/01/2006.

Census of State and Local Law Enforcement Agencies, 2004
(B. Reaves) Reports the results of a census, conducted every four years, of all State and local law enforcement agencies operating nationwide. The report provides the number of employees of State and local law enforcement agencies as of September 2004, including State-by-State data for sheriffs' offices, local police departments, State police and highway patrol agencies, and special jurisdiction police. Expected release date around 06/15/2006.

Law Enforcement Management and Administrative Statistics, 2003: Data for Individual State and Local Agencies with 100 or More Officers
(B. Reaves) Presents agency-specific data collected from more than 800 State and local law enforcement agencies employing 100 or more officers based on the 2003 Law Enforcement Management and Administrative Statistics (LEMAS) survey. The report provides agency-specific information on the characteristics of the largest law enforcement agencies nationwide. Large agencies are described in detail for such issues as staff and financial resources, technologies and equipment in use, and policies and practices of the agencies on a wide array of law enforcement and administrative concerns. Summary data for State police and highway patrol agencies, municipal police departments, county police departments, and sheriffs' offices are also included. Expected release date around 06/15/2006.

Statistical table updates and web content (electronic only):

Homicide Trends in the United States
(M. Zawitz, J. Fox, BJS Visiting Fellow) Updates the section of the BJS website (www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/homicide/homtrnd.htm) about homicide patterns and trends through 2004. This site includes over 50 charts and 100 tables. Topics covered include long term trends, demographic trends, multiple victims and offenders, infanticide, eldercide, homicides by intimates, law enforcement officers killed, weapons trends, clearances, regional trends, and trends by city size. The data analyzed are from the FBI Uniform Crime Reporting Program's Supplementary Homicide Reports. Expected release date around 04/15/2006.

Intimate Partner Violence
(S. Catalano) Examines fatal and non-fatal violence by intimates (current or former spouses, girlfriends, or boyfriends) since the redesign of the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) in 1993. Victim characteristics such as race, sex, age, income, and ethnicity are presented. Measured crimes include murder, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, and simple assault experienced by males and females age 12 years and older. In addition, characteristics of the victimization are presented such as offender use of alcohol/drugs, offender use of weapons, location, time of day, reporting to police,

The Honorable Alberto R. Gonzalez, Attorney General
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20530

Dear Attorney General Gonzalez:

It is my understanding that the city of Palm Bay has applied for federal assistance under the Bureau of Justice Assistance's (BJA) Sex Offender Management Discretionary Grant, and I am pleased to learn of their continued efforts to provide safety for this growing area of my Congressional district.

As I understand it, there are 90 registered sexual offenders and predators living throughout the Palm Bay community and only one sworn officer to monitor them. To successfully manage the sexual offenders and predators, the city proposes to use the funding to add two staff positions to the police department that will assist the Palm Bay Sexual Offender and Predator Unit (PBSOPU) in implementing state, county, and local registration laws. These two new staff positions will also assist in the evaluation of the effectiveness of the current enforcement strategy in the city of Palm Bay.

Any consideration you may give to the city of Palm Bay's application for the BJA Sex Offender Management Discretionary Grant will be greatly appreciated by my constituents. Please let me know the outcome of this important application by contacting my District Office address listed above.

With warm regards and best wishes, I remain,

Sincerely,

Dave Weldon

The Honorable Alberto Gonzales
U.S. Attorney General
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Ave., N.W.
Washington, DC 20530

Dear Attorney General Gonzales,

Between October of 2003 and February of 2004, the Franklin County Sheriff's Office (FCSO) in Ohio spent significant resources investigating a series of sniper shootings on the federal highway system in and around Columbus, OH. These shootings left one person dead, and the ensuing investigation led to the arrest, conviction, and 27-year sentencing of Charles McCoy, Jr.

The enormous cost of this crime's investigation has had a significant impact on the FCSO's budget, which in turn affects the viability of other law enforcement operations. Additionally, the terrorizing nature of these events as well as their occurrence on the federal highway system has raised the question of federal reimbursement for the FCSO's activities. Therefore, I would like to respectfully request you consider any way in which the Department of Justice could compensate the FCSO for any or all of these activities. I have enclosed documentation from the FCSO which details overtime expenses for your reference.

Please do not hesitate to contact me if you require any additional information to move this request forward.

Thank you for your assistance in this matter. I appreciate your time and your consideration.

Very truly yours,

DEBORAH PRYCE

Dear Congresswomen Pryce:

I am writing to request that you introduce an appropriations bill that will place funds into CFDA: 16.577, the Emergency Federal Law Enforcement Assistance Program.

This allocation of funds will allow the state attorney general to apply to the Bureau of Justice Assistance for the reimbursement of costs incurred by the State of Ohio, the Franklin County Sheriff's Office and the City of Columbus during the Central Ohio Sniper Shooting Task Force investigation.

Additionally, I have been informed that the Office of Criminal Justice Services has agreed to use Local Law Enforcement Block Grant funds to reimburse smaller jurisdictions that also participated in the sniper shooting investigation.

I respectfully request your assistance in introducing this necessary appropriations bill.

Sincerely,

Subject: 270 OT Costs

Chief,

Attached is the information you requested on overtime costs for the I-270 shooting investigation. The total for wages alone is $520,378.12. The approximate total, including PERS & Medicare is $614,826.75 This will be a good estimate to provide Washington; however, if we get awarded any monies, we will have to detail out the PERS and Medicare as these are just estimates based on 16.7% for PERS and Medicare applying to everyone. As you know, there were some civilians paid overtime, whose PERS rate is 13.55%, and not everyone has to contribute Medicare.

If you have any questions, give me a call.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ACTING DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: Regina B. Schofield RBS
Assistant Attorney General
Office of Justice Programs

FROM: Maureen A. Henneberg
Acting Deputy Director, Bureau of Justice Statistics

SUBJECT: BJS Statistical Release Report, March 2006

This memorandum contains three sections:

1) Publications
2) Statistical tables and web content that are not printed
3) Recently released materials.

Each section is sequenced by expected release date.

Final release dates are determined by receipt and verification of final data.

Publications:

Press release:
Yes [blank means No]

Survey of State Criminal History Information Systems, 2003
(SEARCH Group Inc.) Describes the status of State criminal history records systems at yearend 2003. The data presented are used as the basis for estimating the percentage of total State records that are immediately available through the FBI's Interstate Identification Index and the percentage that include dispositions. Other data presented include the number of records maintained by each State, the percentage of automated records in the system, and the number of States participating in the FBI's Interstate Identification Index. The publication also contains information regarding the timeliness of data in State record systems, and procedures employed to improve data quality. The report is an update of Survey of State Criminal History Information Systems, 2001, released in September 2003, and is the eighth in the series that began with 1989 data. Expected release around 03/02/2006.

Yes Identity Theft, 2004

(K. Baum) Presents data on identity theft victimization and its consequences from the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS). This is the first report from new questions about identity theft added to the survey in July 2004 and encompasses credit card thefts, thefts from existing accounts, misuse of personal information, and multiple types at the same time. The report, based on interviews with 40,000 household residents drawn to be nationally representative, describes age, race, and ethnicity of the household head; household income; and location of the household (urbanicity). Characteristics of the theft presented include economic loss, how the theft was discovered, whether misuse is ongoing, and problems experienced as a result of the identity theft. Expected release around 03/15/2006.

Crime and the Nation's Households, 2004

(P. Klaus) Presents information on the percentage of households or persons in households who are victimized as measured by the National Crime Victimization Survey. Findings are presented by region; by urban, suburban or rural location; and by household size. This annual report also includes overall trends since 1994, vandalism, and intimate partner violence. Expected release around 03/31/2006.

Improving Criminal History Records for Background Checks, 2005

(G. Ramker) Describes the achievements of the National Criminal History Improvement Program (NCHIP), its authorizing legislation and program history. This annual Bulletin summarizes NCHIP-funded criminal record improvement efforts, including improved accessibility of records, full participation in the Interstate Identification Index, the automation of records and fingerprint data, and improvements in the National Instant Criminal Background Check, National Sex Offender Registry, and domestic violence and protection order systems. The report provides examples of projects aimed at enhancing the involvement of the courts and system integration in improving disposition reporting. The report also discusses the Bureau of Justice Statistics' efforts to improve performance measurement including the development and use of a Records Quality Index. Expected release around 03/31/2006.

Characteristics of Drivers Stopped by Police, 2002

(E. Smith, M. Durose) Presents data on the nature and characteristics of traffic stops, as collected in the 2002 Police Public Contact Survey, a supplement to the National Crime Victimization Survey. Detailed demographic information is presented on the 16.8

million drivers stopped by police in 2002. The report provides statistics about various outcomes of traffic stops, including searches conducted by police, tickets issued to drivers stopped for speeding, arrests of stopped drivers, and police use of force during a traffic stop. The report also discusses the relevance of the survey findings to the issue of racial profiling and provides comparative analysis with prior survey findings. Expected release around 04/15/2006.

Justice Expenditure and Employment in the United States, 2003

(K. Hughes) Provides selected data from the U.S. Census Bureau's Annual General Finance and Employment Surveys. Data presented include police protection, judicial and legal services, and corrections expenditure and employment for Federal, State, and local governments in 2003 and national trend data for 1982 to 2003. Expenditure data are provided for fiscal year 2003; employment and payroll data are for the month of March 2003. The report compares justice expenditure to spending for other governmental services and analyzes trends in justice spending and employment. It also presents per capita employment data relative to other State and government services, as well as per capita expenditure data by governmental function. Expected release date around 04/15/2006.

Local Police Departments, 2003

(M. Hickman, B. Reaves) Presents data collected from a representative sample of local police departments nationwide on a variety of agency characteristics based on the 2003 Law Enforcement Management and Administrative Statistics (LEMAS) survey. National estimates for local police departments are provided for such issues as staff and financial resources, technologies and equipment in use, and policies and practices of the agencies on a wide array of law enforcement and administrative concerns. Expected release around 04/15/2006.

Sheriffs' Offices, 2003

(M. Hickman, B. Reaves) Presents data collected from a representative sample of sheriffs' offices nationwide on a variety of agency characteristics based on the 2003 LEMAS survey. National estimates for sheriffs' offices are provided for such issues as staff and financial resources, technologies and equipment in use, and agency policies and practices covering a wide array of law enforcement and administrative concerns. Expected release date around 04/15/2006.

Federal Criminal Justice Trends, 2003

(M. Motivans) Presents data on Federal criminal justice trends from 1994-2003. This report summarizes the activities of agencies at each stage of the Federal criminal case process. It includes 10-year trend statistics on the number arrested (with detail on drug offenses); number and disposition of suspects investigated by U.S. attorneys; number of persons detained prior to trial; number of defendants in cases filed, convicted, and sentenced; and number of offenders under Federal correctional supervision (incarceration, supervised release, probation, and parole). Expected release around 04/30/2006.

National Corrections Reporting Program, 2002 CD-ROM

(T. Hughes, A. Beck) Presents data on admissions, releases, and parole outcomes of persons in the Nation's State prisons and parole systems, including demographic characteristics, offenses, sentence length, type of admission, time to be served, method of release, and actual time served of inmates exiting prison and parole. In 2002, 39 States reported data. Included on the CD-ROM are ASCII files that require the use of specific statistical software packages, a code book, statistical software setup files, and explanatory notes. Expected release date around 04/30/2006.

Prison and Jail Inmates, Midyear 2005

(P. Harrison, A. Beck) Presents data on prison and jail inmates, collected from National Prisoner Statistics counts and the Annual Survey of Jails in 2005. This annual report provides for each State and the Federal system, the number of inmates and the overall incarceration rate per 100,000 residents. It offers trends since 1995 and percentage changes in prison populations since midyear and yearend 2004. The midyear report presents the number of prison inmates held in private facilities and the number of prisoners under 18 years of age held by State correctional authorities. It includes total numbers for prison and jail inmates by gender, race, and Hispanic origin as well as counts of jail inmates by conviction status and confinement status. The report also provides findings on rated capacity of local jails, percent of capacity occupied, and capacity added. Standard errors for jail estimates are provided in the appendix tables of the electronic version of this report. Expected release date around 04/30/2006.

(B. Reaves) Presents data collected from a representative sample of felony cases that resulted in a felony conviction for a violent offense in 40 of the Nation's 75 largest counties. The study tracks cases for up to 1 year from the date of filing through final disposition. Defendants convicted of murder, rape, robbery, assault or other violent felony are described in terms of demographic characteristics (gender, race, Hispanic origin, age), prior arrests and convictions, criminal justice status at time of arrest, type of pretrial release or detention, type of adjudication, and sentence received. Expected release around 04/30/2006.

State Court Organization, 2004
(D. Rottman, S. Strickland, T. Cohen, BJS project monitor) Presents detailed comparative data by State trial and appellate courts in the United States. Topics covered include: the number of courts and judges; process for judicial selection; governance of court systems, including judicial funding, administration, staffing, and procedures; jury qualifications and verdict rules; and processing and sentencing procedures for criminal cases. Diagrams of court structure summarize the key features of each State's court organization. This fifth edition of State Court Organization is a joint effort of the Conference of State Court Administrators, the National Center for State Courts, and BJS. Expected release date around 05/01/2006.

Federal Law Enforcement Officers, 2004
(B. Reaves) Reports the results of a biennial census of Federal agencies employing personnel with arrest and firearms authority. Using agency classifications, the report presents the number of officers working in the areas of police patrol and response, criminal investigation and enforcement, security and protection, court operations, and corrections, by agency and State, as of September 2004. Data on gender and race of officers are also included. Expected release date around 05/15/2006.

Medical Problems of Jail Inmates, 2002
(L. Maruschak) Presents findings on jail inmates who reported a current medical problem, a physical impairment or mental condition, or an injury since admission based on data from the 2002 Survey of Inmates in Local Jails. The prevalence of specific medical problems and conditions are also included. The report examines medical problems and other conditions by gender, age, time served since admission, and select background characteristics. Expected release date around 05/15/2006.

Appeals from General Civil Trials in 46 Large Counties, 2001-2005
(T. Cohen) Presents information on general civil cases concluded by bench or jury trial in 2001 that were subsequently appealed to a State's intermediate appellate court or court of last resort. Information presented includes the flow of civil cases through the appeals process and the affect of appeals on trial court outcomes. The report describes the types of civil bench and jury trials appealed, the characteristics of litigants filing an appeal, the frequency in which appellate courts affirm, reverse, or modify trial court outcomes, and the percentage of appeals that produced a published opinion. Cases further appealed from an intermediate appellate court to a State court of last resort and the impact of that final level of appeal on litigation outcomes are also described. This report is part of a series examining civil litigation in the United States. Expected release date around 06/01/2006.

Census of State and Local Law Enforcement Agencies, 2004
(B. Reaves) Reports the results of a census, conducted every four years, of all State and local law enforcement agencies operating nationwide. The report provides the number of employees of State and local law enforcement agencies as of September 2004, including State-by-State data for sheriffs' offices, local police departments, State police and highway patrol agencies, and special jurisdiction police. Expected release date around 06/15/2006.

Law Enforcement Management and Administrative Statistics, 2003: Data for Individual State and Local Agencies with 100 or More Officers
(B. Reaves) Presents agency-specific data collected from more than 800 State and local law enforcement agencies employing 100 or more officers based on the 2003 Law Enforcement Management and Administrative Statistics (LEMAS) survey. The report provides agency-specific information on the characteristics of the largest law enforcement agencies nationwide. Large agencies are described in detail for such issues as staff and financial resources, technologies and equipment in use, and policies and practices of the agencies on a wide array of law enforcement and administrative concerns. Summary data for State police and highway patrol agencies, municipal police departments, county police departments, and sheriffs' offices are also included. Expected release date around 06/15/2006.

Statistical table updates and web content (electronic only):

Homicide Trends in the United States
(M. Zawitz, J. Fox, BJS Visiting Fellow) Updates the section of the BJS website (www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/homicide/homtrnd.htm) about homicide patterns and trends through 2004. This site includes over 50 charts and 100 tables. Topics covered include long term trends, demographic trends, multiple victims and offenders, infanticide, eldercide, homicides by intimates, law enforcement officers killed, weapons trends, clearances, regional trends, and trends by city size. The data analyzed are from the FBI Uniform Crime Reporting Program's Supplementary Homicide Reports. Expected release date around 04/15/2006.

Intimate Partner Violence
(S. Catalano) Examines fatal and non-fatal violence by intimates (current or former spouses, girlfriends, or boyfriends) since the redesign of the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) in 1993. Victim characteristics such as race, sex, age, income, and ethnicity are presented. Measured crimes include murder, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, and simple assault experienced by males and females age 12 years and older. In addition, characteristics of the victimization are presented such as offender use of alcohol/drugs, offender use of weapons, location, time of day, reporting to police,

Dear Attorney General Gonzalez:

It is my understanding that the city of Palm Bay has applied for federal assistance under the Bureau of Justice Assistance's (BJA) Sex Offender Management Discretionary Grant, and I am pleased to learn of their continued efforts to provide safety for this growing area of my Congressional district.

As I understand it, there are 90 registered sexual offenders and predators living throughout the Palm Bay community and only one sworn officer to monitor them. To successfully manage the sexual offenders and predators, the city proposes to use the funding to add two staff positions to the police department that will assist the Palm Bay Sexual Offender and Predator Unit (PBSOPU) in implementing state, county, and local registration laws. These two new staff positions will also assist in the evaluation of the effectiveness of the current enforcement strategy in the city of Palm Bay.

Any consideration you may give to the city of Palm Bay's application for the BJA Sex Offender Management Discretionary Grant will be greatly appreciated by my constituents. Please let me know the outcome of this important application by contacting my District Office address listed above.

With warm regards and best wishes, I remain,

Sincerely,

Dave Weldon

Dear Attorney General Gonzales,

Between October of 2003 and February of 2004, the Franklin County Sheriff's Office (FCSO) in Ohio spent significant resources investigating a series of sniper shootings on the federal highway system in and around Columbus, OH. These shootings left one person dead, and the ensuing investigation led to the arrest, conviction, and 27-year sentencing of Charles McCoy, Jr.

The enormous cost of this crime's investigation has had a significant impact on the FCSO's budget, which in turn affects the viability of other law enforcement operations. Additionally, the terrorizing nature of these events as well as their occurrence on the federal highway system has raised the question of federal reimbursement for the FCSO's activities. Therefore, I would like to respectfully request you consider any way in which the Department of Justice could compensate the FCSO for any or all of these activities. I have enclosed documentation from the FCSO which details overtime expenses for your reference.

Please do not hesitate to contact me if you require any additional information to move this request forward.

Thank you for your assistance in this matter. I appreciate your time and your consideration.

Very truly yours,

Dear Congresswomen Pryce:

I am writing to request that you introduce an appropriations bill that will place funds into CFDA: 16.577, the Emergency Federal Law Enforcement Assistance Program.

This allocation of funds will allow the state attorney general to apply to the Bureau of Justice Assistance for the reimbursement of costs incurred by the State of Ohio, the Franklin County Sheriff's Office and the City of Columbus during the Central Ohio Sniper Shooting Task Force investigation.

Additionally, I have been informed that the Office of Criminal Justice Services has agreed to use Local Law Enforcement Block Grant funds to reimburse smaller jurisdictions that also participated in the sniper shooting investigation.

I respectfully request your assistance in introducing this necessary appropriations bill.

Sincerely,

Chief,

Attached is the information you requested on overtime costs for the I-270 shooting investigation. The total for wages alone is $520,378.12. The approximate total, including PERS & Medicare is $614,826.75 This will be a good estimate to provide Washington; however, if we get awarded any monies, we will have to detail out the PERS and Medicare as these are just estimates based on 16.7% for PERS and Medicare applying to everyone. As you know, there were some civilians paid overtime, whose PERS rate is 13.55%, and not everyone has to contribute Medicare.

If you have any questions, give me a call.

February 16, 2006

The Honorable Alberto Gonzales
Attorney General
United States Department of Justice
Washington, DC

Dear Attorney General Gonzales,

I am writing to express my concern about the research conducted by Professor Mark Fleisher of Case Western Reserve University, using funds allocated under the Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003. Fleisher received $939,233 to conduct a study on prison rape. Although the National Institute of Justice has called the report incomplete, Fleisher has been publicizing his research and the funding provided by the National Institute of Justice and the Department of Justice. I urge the Department to clarify its position on the research.

First, I am concerned that the study did not follow the most fundamental research requirements, let alone reach the high standards expected of a government-funded study of this magnitude and cost. While Fleisher claims to have conducted 705 hours of interviews with 564 inmates between February 2003 and September 2005, he has provided virtually no details about his research subjects or the raw data from his interviews. He has provided unclear information about his research methodology and research subject selection process. He did not seek corroborating or conflicting evidence and cites no academic work in his report. He makes broad and contentious assertions that are often conflicting, and his work as a whole is incoherent.

Fleisher concludes that "prison rape occurs infrequently" and prison sexual activity is largely consensual. To arrive at this conclusion, his report excludes inmates who have acknowledged being raped from the interview sample. He also discounts the stories of inmates who have described forced sexual abuse without using the word "rape" and creates an exceedingly narrow definition of rape in the prison context. For instance, Fleisher describes an inmate forced to provide sexual favors because he has borrowed a package of soup as a "socio-economic interaction," not as rape, sexual assault or prostitution. Further, he uses an inmate's description of surrendering to his rapist after being choked as a demonstration of "the ambiguity of the convergence between rape and consent." Fleisher's conclusions are unsubstantiated by the interviews he cites and are in direct conflict with virtually all other research conducted on the subject.[1]

[1] See U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF CORRECTIONS, ANNOTATED BIBLIOGRAPHY OF PRISON RAPE / INMATE SEXUAL ASSAULT (July 20, 2004).

Second, this report underscores prior concerns about Fleisher's objectivity. His latest study is based on the hypothesis that prison rape is an "idea," not a reality. One month after the Act was signed into law, he stated that he had been delegated the responsibility of designing a National Institute of Justice study on prison rape. In an e-mail in 2003 to Stanford Law School Professor Robert Weisberg before beginning his research, he asserted the same conclusions he claims to have now documented through government-funded research. In this email, he described forced sexual relations as "infrequent" and providing an "informal social control function" within prisons; he noted the benefit of "a suspension of unsupported, stereotypic assumptions about American prisons"; and he framed a "better question" about "why...we want to believe the inmate who alleges rape and disregard the majority of inmates who say they weren't rape [sic] or have not seen such incidents." Based on these concerns, my office raised concerns about Fleisher's objectivity with Adam Specter at the Office of Justice Programs on October 17, 2003, specifically identifying concerns about Fleisher's objectivity and questioning his alarming and inappropriate statements. In particular, we raised concerns about Fleisher's reliance on anecdotes to challenge what he described as the "Oz myth of rape." The outcome of his research has underscored these pre-existing concerns, and I request that more information on the process by which the National Institute of Justice selected Fleisher to direct this study be provided to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Third, I am concerned about the position of the Department of Justice and the National Institute of Justice on Fleisher's report. The Department and the Institute have made no official statement on the report except to state that it is incomplete – even though Fleisher has been promoting his affiliation with the Institute and the report has been mentioned in various newspapers across the country.

I respectfully request that you seek a peer-review analysis of Fleisher's research and that you clarify the public position of the Institute and the Department on his conclusions. I also request your response to the following critical questions:

1. What was the procedure for selecting Fleisher to direct this study? In its guidelines, the Institute states that proposals are reviewed by independent peer review panels consisting of researchers and practitioners, and that assessments and reports are submitted to the Institute's Director. Please provide these assessments and reports as well as any additional information to clarify the process used to select Fleisher to direct a study of this magnitude and importance.
2. What were the guidelines established by the Institute and Fleisher for this research? The Institute's guidelines state that application files consist of a program proposal and narrative, and these would clarify what Fleisher intended to research. Please provide Fleisher's application, the contract reached between the Institute and Fleisher, and any changes made to the proposal that would clarify the parameters of Fleisher's research and his obligations to the Institute.

3. How was the $939,233 allocated for Fleisher's research spent? The Institute requires narrative progress and financial reports throughout the period of all research grants. Please provide the Judiciary Committee and the Prison Rape Elimination Commission access to Fleisher's progress and financial reports to understand the use of the funds expended on this project. If an audit has been conducted, as is often done for such substantial allocations, please make the reports of the auditors available as well.

4. Has Fleisher provided a more in-depth analysis of his research subjects and methodology than was included in the draft report? Under the Institute's post-award reporting requirements grant recipients must provide a final report including a detailed description of the project design, data, and methods, and a full presentation of scientific findings. The draft report provides an insufficient description of the research conducted. The Senate Judiciary Committee and the Prison Rape Elimination Commission should be granted immediate access to the final report when it becomes available, as well as any additional information currently available that would provide more information about Fleisher's methodology.

I hope that this study and the surrounding questions will receive your immediate attention, and I look forward to your response.

With respect and appreciation,

Sincerely,

Edward M. Kennedy

Mr. Attorney General:

I am writing to you as a member of the United States Interagency Council on Homelessness concerning the 2005 Annual Report of the Council.

Section 203[c] of the McKinney-Vento Homeless Assistance Act, as amended, (42 USC 11313) requires the Interagency Council and each member agency of the Council to prepare an annual report on their activities. Under the Act, which was reauthorized in 2001, each agency is required to prepare and submit a report to the Congress and the Council that describes:

- "Each program to assist homeless individuals administered by [your agency] and the number of homeless individuals served by such program;
- Impediments, including any statutory and regulatory restrictions, to the use by homeless individuals of each such program and to obtaining services or benefits under each such program; and
- Efforts made by your agency to increase the opportunities for homeless individuals to obtain shelter, food and supportive services."

The Council itself is required to prepare a report to the President and Congress that assesses the nature and extent of homelessness, describes USICH accomplishments and those of other agencies, and provides recommendations for legislative and administrative actions. HUD, HHS, VA and Labor have additional Congressionally mandated reporting requirements.

Council staff traditionally work with the member agencies to coordinate a single submission that includes the agency reports and an overview of its own activities. We will continue that practice this year.

To allow sufficient time for review, editing and clearance, please ensure that we receive your agency's report by Wednesday, March 15, 2006.

Attached is an outline for your agency submission and detailed submission and formatting instructions. Please contact Mary Ellen Hombs, USICH Deputy Director, if you have questions, at 202/708-4663.

Thank you for your cooperation and support.

Sincerely,

Philip F. Mangano
Executive Director

2005 ANNUAL REPORT:

SUBMISSION REQUIREMENTS FOR COUNCIL MEMBER AGENCIES

Please provide a hard copy and an electronic copy of your submission in Microsoft Word by March 15, 2006. Your electronic file should be named as follows:

2005 [Your Agency Name] USICH Annual Report Submission

Your electronic file should be submitted to: Maryellen.hombs@usich.gov

Your document submitted to USICH should be formatted as follows:

1. Use Microsoft Word format only.
2. Use Arial 12pt. font throughout.
3. Use 1" margins throughout.
4. All pages and tables should be portrait (vertical/normal) layout only.
5. Complete the Agency Name section of the header.
6. Use header numbering system only – do not add other page numbers.
7. Please do not tab paragraphs.

Templates are attached for narrative and table sections following the prescribed format.

Files that do not meet these requirements will be returned to the submitting agency before further review.

Your submission should include:

1. Overview of agency homeless assistance responsibilities and 2005 activities and accomplishments.

2. For each program that provides homeless assistance, a description of the following:

   a) Statutory authority

   b) For targeted homeless assistance programs: 2005 and 2006 appropriation, 2007 President's Request

c) For non-targeted programs: Best estimate of the amount of that program's assistance to the homeless for the most recent year for which information is available

d) Program description (purpose, eligible applicants/recipients, eligible activities, etc.)

e) Planned evaluations or other studies or reports of the program's administration, performance or impact.

NOTE: In 2000 the Senate Appropriations Committee instructed the Council to specifically require HUD, HHS, Labor and VA to:

- quantify the number of their program participants who become homeless
- address ways in which mainstream programs can prevent homelessness among those they serve
- describe specifically how they provide assistance to people who are homeless.

The four agencies named above should provide this specific information on mainstream programs in addition to the general information above.

3. For each program that provides homeless assistance, a description of the following (not to exceed one page):

   a) Known impediments to access by homeless people or homeless service providers (as appropriate) and the current or planned agency response to remove those impediments; and

   b) Efforts to increase participation in the program by (as appropriate) homeless people or organizations serving homeless people.

We will also be compiling a list of currently available Federal publications on homelessness to be included as an appendix to the report. Please also provide:

1. One copy of each such publication
2. Information on how to order the publication (name, address, telephone number and cost, if any)
3. The Web address, if the publication is available on the Web.

Please address your submission of publications or other hard-copy material to:

Dear Attorney General Gonzales:

In late 2003, the I-270 outer-belt in central Ohio was the target of a serial shooter. The Franklin County Sheriff's Office led a five-month multi-jurisdictional task force investigation that culminated in the arrest of the perpetrator in April 2004. The estimated cost to Franklin County for law enforcement overtime wages and fringe benefits totaled $614,826.71. We are seeking your assistance in obtaining federal assistance to reimburse that cost to Franklin County.

The Ohio Office of Criminal Justice Services utilized Local Law Enforcement Block Grant (LLEBG) funds to provide reimbursement to the smaller jurisdictions that participated in the I-270 Serial Shooter investigation. Because Franklin County is a direct recipient of LLEBG funds we are unable to apply for reimbursement at the state level and were directed to apply through the Federal Law Enforcement Assistance Program CFDA: 16.577. We were subsequently notified that congress had failed to appropriate funds in CFDA: 16.577.

On April 29, 2004, Franklin County requested the assistance of Congresswoman Deborah Pryce to introduce an appropriations bill to place funds into CFDA: 16.577, the Federal Law Enforcement Assistance Program. This request was made to allow the Ohio Attorney General to apply to the Bureau of Justice Assistance for reimbursement of extraordinary costs incurred by state and local law enforcement during the I-270 Serial Shooter investigation. To date, we have had no response to our request and we are respectfully requesting your direction and assistance in resolving this long standing issue.

I am writing . . .

. . . in support of the Legal Assistance for Victims Grant Program request submitted by Help Against Violent Encounters Now (HAVEN) and the Women's Survival Center of Oakland County (WSC).

This funding will enable WSC and HAVEN to develop a Legal Education and Access Program (LEAP) for low-income and minority women and families in Oakland County, who are victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. Working collaboratively with community agencies, faith-based entities and attorneys, LEAP will provide victims with access to legal assistance, counseling, safety planning and training. With a growing population, economic diversity and the second highest number of reported domestic violence cases in Michigan, Oakland County has a need for an innovative program of this type.

I am impressed by the efforts of WSC and HAVEN to provide legal services and counseling to Oakland County's vulnerable and underserved populations. I hope you will give strong consideration to their grant request.

Sincerely,

Debbie

Dear Mr. Gonzales:

Knowing that you have a great concern for enhancing crime prevention, particularly gun violence prevention through Project Safe Neighborhoods, I wanted to share our Rap Against Violence CD with you. It was released January 26 and is available for downloading or copying on our website at http://www.sa18.state.fl.us.

The CD, which will be distributed free across Central Florida, is the culmination of a contest which chose the 10 best original songs for professional production at Lou Pearlman's Trans Continental Studios in Orlando, one of the contest co-sponsors. The songs will be aired on 102 JAMZ and public service announcements featuring each of the winners will be broadcast on Bright House Networks channels. Both Bright House and 102 JAMZ are also contest co-sponsors.

The contest is an effort to address mounting gun crime by recruiting local hip hop artists to rap against gun violence. We have the right message—put the guns down or do hard time. Now we have the right messengers.

The 10 winning songs come from a diverse group and represent people who live in six Central Florida counties. The winners include a U.S. Airman stationed now in Iraqi, a rap-writing grandmother from Deltona, high school students from Seminole, Osceola, Orange, Lake, and Brevard counties, and a business man from Orlando.

I extend a challenge to other Florida communities to promote gun violence prevention rap competitions, as well as challenge the hip hop community to change direction. Leaders in the hip hop world should expand their influence to address real problems and real solutions to make communities better and not just glorify violence. From what I have experienced in working on this competition, I think that day is here.

Tony Dungy, coach of the Indianapolis Colts, said it best at his son Jamie's funeral in December when he commented that "our boys are getting a lot of wrong messages about what it means to be a man in this world. And about how to act." He called upon those attending the service to continue sending the right message and to become even bolder as positive role models for our youth.

Hopefully, our talented rappers will be able to do just that and spread a word-of-mouth epidemic against gun violence throughout Florida, making every community safer from gun violence. After listening to the CD, I would appreciate any comments or ideas you may have.

Sincerely,

NORMAN R. WOLFINGER

MEMORANDUM

TO: Andy Beach
Assistant to the Attorney General for Scheduling

THROUGH: Regina B. Schofield
Assistant Attorney General
Office of Justice Programs

FROM: John W. Gillis
Director
Office for Victims of Crime

BACKGROUND: This April will mark the 26th commemoration of National Crime Victims' Rights Week (NCVRW). President Reagan proclaimed the first National Crime Victims' Rights Week in 1981 and hosted the first Victims' Rights Week Awards Ceremony at the White House three years later. Every April since then, local communities throughout the Nation have held public rallies, candlelight vigils, and a host of other events to commemorate this week and to promote awareness of victims' rights and needs. This year's theme for NCVRW is "Victims' Rights: Strength in Unity."

REQUEST: The Office for Victims of Crime (OVC) was honored to have Attorney General Gonzales preside over last year's National Crime Victims' Candlelight Observance and the National Crime Victims' Rights Week Awards Ceremony. OVC requests that the Attorney General again provide remarks at the 2006 National Crime Victims' Candlelight Observance on Thursday, April 20, and at the 2006 National Crime Victims' Rights Week Awards Ceremony on Friday, April 21.

PURPOSE: OVC will kick off the national observance of National Crime Victims' Rights Week, April 23 through 29, 2006, with a candlelight observance to pay tribute to crime victims and with an awards ceremony to honor individuals and organizations for their work in serving crime victims and advancing victims' rights.

DATE & TIME:	The National Crime Victims' Candlelight Observance is scheduled to begin at 6:30 p.m. on Thursday, April 20, 2006, at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The National Crime Victims' Rights Week Awards Ceremony is scheduled to begin at 2:30 p.m. on Friday, April 21, 2006, at the Andrew W. Mellon Auditorium. Of the two events, the Awards Ceremony is the event for which we request the Attorney General's higher priority, if he is unable to attend both. The Awards Ceremony will be followed by a reception.
LOCATION:	The National Crime Victims' Candlelight Observance will be held at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce Hall of Flags at 1615 H Street, NW., Washington, D.C. (across from Lafayette Square). The National Crime Victims' Rights Week Awards Ceremony will be held at the Andrew W. Mellon Auditorium, 1301 Constitution Avenue, NW., Washington, D.C.
DURATION:	The National Crime Victims' Candlelight Observance is expected to last one hour. We request that the Attorney General speak for up to 10 minutes. The National Crime Victims' Rights Week Awards Ceremony is expected to last one and one-half hours with a one hour reception to follow. We request that the Attorney General speak for up to 20 minutes, present the honorees with their awards, and be photographed with them.
PRESS COVERAGE:	National and local media are expected at both events.
POSSIBLE PARTICIPANTS:	Approximately 500 participants are expected to attend the April 20 candlelight observance. At the candlelight observance it is expected that a crime victim will share his or her story of victimization and survival. Approximately 200 to 300 participants are expected at the awards ceremony on April 21. The Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Justice Programs has been invited to attend and deliver remarks at both events.
REMARKS REQUIRED:	At the candlelight observance on April 20, OVC requests remarks that honor the memory of victims and the work of victim advocates. At the awards event on April 21, OVC requests remarks that acknowledge award recipients and that highlight the Attorney General's and the Justice Department's efforts on behalf of crime victims. OVC is available to prepare talking points for the AG if he accepts one or both invitations.

Dear Ms. Stewart:

I am writing in support of Kalamazoo County's application for the Safe Haven Supervised Visitation and Safe Exchange Grant. This grant will help Kalamazoo County deal with the visitation and exchange of kids involved in domestic violence situations. This program is an important part of managing and helping everyone involved in domestic violence, particularly the children.

Kalamazoo County will partner with the Children and Family Services, YWCA, Department of Human Services, Probation Office and the Office of the Prosecuting Attorney to help make this program a success. These agencies and groups have a history of working collaboratively and effectively together for the benefit of the communities they serve.

Children are our most precious resource and programs like this are vital to benefit the families and children of Kalamazoo County.

Again, I strongly support Kalamazoo County's application for a Safe Haven grant and trust that it will receive full and fair consideration.

Sincerely,

Carl Levin

Dear Mr. Moschella:

I am writing to you on behalf on the YWCA Legal Clinic. It is my understanding that the YWCA has submitted an application to the United States Department of Justice, Office on Violence Against Women for a Legal Assistance for Victims grant. Funding from this grant would enable the YWCA to provide civil legal services to victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, and/or stalking in Dauphin County, Pennsylvania.

I am advised that the YWCA Legal Clinic would use the funding to provide a full-time attorney to provide legal representation for the underserved populations of Dauphin County, both rural and urban. The YWCA Legal Clinic plans to collaborate with Widener Law School's Civil Law Clinic, as well as maintain a satellite legal office at the Community Check-Up Center in order to provide the most access and services to victims. In addition, I am told the YWCA will offer educational programs on domestic violence and sexual assault to both staff and Widener students, as well as to targeted community members.

It appears that this proposal would benefit victims of domestic violence in Dauphin County, Pennsylvania. Accordingly, I urge you to give it your full and fair consideration for funding approval. Please direct your reply to my Director of Special Projects, Kate Kelly, at 711 Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, DC 20510.

Sincerely,

Arlen Specter

RE: Civil Society's grant application, CFDA #: 16.524 (OVW-2006-1204)

Dear Ms. Stuart:

I write in support of a joint application submitted by Civil Society (CS), Domestic Abuse Project (DAP) and Asian Women United (AWUM) for a $450,000 grant to support their partnership that provides legal services and advocacy programs for immigrant women of domestic abuse, sexual assault and stalking in Minnesota.

I support the mission of these organizations to provide culturally appropriate and competent legal and support services to crime victims of domestic violence. Since its inception in 1996, Civil Society has offered free legal advice and advocacy for our growing immigrant and refugee crime victim population in Minnesota. With funding support from the Office of Violence Against Women, Civil Society and its partners will be able to continue providing legal services and advocacy to serve low-income women and children who are victims of crime.

I urge your support of this application, and I thank you for your consideration of this request.

U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW, Room 1145
Washington, DC 20530

Dear Mr. Moschella:

I am writing to you on behalf on the YWCA Legal Clinic. It is my understanding that the YWCA has submitted an application to the United States Department of Justice, Office on Violence Against Women for a Legal Assistance for Victims grant. Funding from this grant would enable the YWCA to provide civil legal services to victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, and/or stalking in Dauphin County, Pennsylvania.

I am advised that the YWCA Legal Clinic would use the funding to provide a full-time attorney to provide legal representation for the underserved populations of Dauphin County, both rural and urban. The YWCA Legal Clinic plans to collaborate with Widener Law School's Civil Law Clinic, as well as maintain a satellite legal office at the Community Check-Up Center in order to provide the most access and services to victims. In addition, I am told the YWCA will offer educational programs on domestic violence and sexual assault to both staff and Widener students, as well as to targeted community members.

It appears that this proposal would benefit victims of domestic violence in Dauphin County, Pennsylvania. Accordingly, I urge you to give it your full and fair consideration for funding approval. Please direct your reply to my Director of Special Projects, Kate Kelly, at 711 Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, DC 20510.

Sincerely,

Arlen Specter

RE: Civil Society's grant application, CFDA #: 16.524 (OVW-2006-1204)

Dear Ms. Stuart:

I write in support of a joint application submitted by Civil Society (CS), Domestic Abuse Project (DAP) and Asian Women United (AWUM) for a $450,000 grant to support their partnership that provides legal services and advocacy programs for immigrant women of domestic abuse, sexual assault and stalking in Minnesota.

I support the mission of these organizations to provide culturally appropriate and competent legal and support services to crime victims of domestic violence. Since its inception in 1996, Civil Society has offered free legal advice and advocacy for our growing immigrant and refugee crime victim population in Minnesota. With funding support from the Office of Violence Against Women, Civil Society and its partners will be able to continue providing legal services and advocacy to serve low-income women and children who are victims of crime.

I urge your support of this application, and I thank you for your consideration of this request.

Dear Ms. Stewart:

I am writing in support of Kalamazoo County's application for the Safe Haven Supervised Visitation and Safe Exchange Grant. This grant will help Kalamazoo County deal with the visitation and exchange of kids involved in domestic violence situations. This program is an important part of managing and helping everyone involved in domestic violence, particularly the children.

Kalamazoo County will partner with the Children and Family Services, YWCA, Department of Human Services, Probation Office and the Office of the Prosecuting Attorney to help make this program a success. These agencies and groups have a history of working collaboratively and effectively together for the benefit of the communities they serve.

Children are our most precious resource and programs like this are vital to benefit the families and children of Kalamazoo County.

Again, I strongly support Kalamazoo County's application for a Safe Haven grant and trust that it will receive full and fair consideration.

Sincerely,

SUBJECT: Violent Offender Incarceration/Truth-in-Sentencing (VOI/TIS) Incentive Formula Grant Program

Overview

The Violent Offender Incarceration and Truth-in-Sentencing (VOI/TIS) Incentive Formula Grant Program provided states with funding to build or expand correctional facilities and jails. From fiscal years (FYs) 1996 through 2001, half of the funds were made available for Violent Offender Incarceration Grants, and half were available as incentive awards to states that implement truth-in-sentencing laws.

VOI/TIS grant funds allowed states to build or expand correctional facilities to increase the bed capacity for the confinement of persons convicted of Part 1 violent crimes or adjudicated delinquents for an act that, if committed by an adult, would be a Part 1 violent crime. Funds could also be used to build or expand temporary or permanent correctional facilities, including facilities on military bases, prison barges, and boot camps; to confine convicted nonviolent offenders and criminal aliens; or to free suitable existing prison space for the confinement of persons convicted of Part 1 violent crimes. States also were able to award subgrants of up to 15 percent of their award to local units of government to build or expand jails, and up to 10 percent of a state's VOI/TIS award (1) to the costs of offender drug testing or intervention programs during periods of incarceration and post-incarceration criminal justice supervision and/or (2) to pay the costs of providing the required reports on prison drug use. While the primary purpose of the VOI/TIS program is to build or expand long term medium to maximum security correctional facilities, VOI/TIS funds can also be used for the following:

1) Community based correctional options that free up secure institutional bed space. These can either be early release options or direct sentencing options. Examples include but are not limited to:

a) Half-way houses;
b) Home detention programs;
c) Bracelet programs;
d) GPS tracking programs;
e) Day-reporting centers;
f) Work-release programs;
g) Community based treatment programs (substance abuse, mental health, sex offender, etc.);
h) Family reunification programs (centers or facilities where parent and children are allowed to live on a trial basis under intensive supervision).

2) Parole Centers, these can either be pre-release or revocation centers but they keep this population out of the more secure, general population beds.

3) Reception and diagnostic centers, these must be long-term placements that free up secure beds.

4) Geriatric facilities, as the prison population ages, these would provide for more suitable correctional settings and free up secure beds.

5) Infirmaries, again these must be long-term housing options.

6) Leasing of Space, VOI/TIS funds can also be used for the short or long-term leasing of space from private or non-profit providers. These facilities can be either operated by the private firm or the state.

7) Juvenile Correctional facilities, these can be all of the projects listed above plus straight housing of non-violent juveniles. This purpose is capped at 10% unless the state declares exigent circumstances and then all of the grant funds can be used on juvenile programs.

8) Jail-based programs, this purpose is capped at 15% but allows for renovation and maintenance cost of local jail or detention facilities which cannot be funded elsewhere.

9) Drug testing, treatment and interventions, of the money received since FY 1999, 10% percent may be used for this purpose. Projects funded under this purpose can include but are not limited to:

a) Treatment programs and/or treatment staff;
b) Testing equipment and supplies;
c) K-9 units or other detection programs;
d) Staff overtime for contraband searches, prevention activities, treatment, etc.;
e) Aftercare services such as community-based treatment, housing, job placement, educational services, etc.

Current Status
As of the January expenditure reports:

*There is currently still $569,998,539 remaining to be drawndown by grantees.

*At current expenditure rates we anticipate as much as $280,000,000 still remaining in September of 2006 when most of these grants are scheduled to expire.

*11 jurisdictions have already drawndown all their funds. They are: Alaska; Delaware; Washington, DC; Florida; Idaho; Iowa; Maine; Michigan; Montana; New York; and North Dakota.

*The 10 jurisdictions with the most still be drawndown (by percentage of their total grant award) are: N. Marianas Islands; Hawaii; Tennessee; Texas; Rhode Island; Puerto Rico; Pennsylvania; Illinois; Missouri; and Louisiana.

*All grants are scheduled to expire as of 9/30/06 except the following which have received at least a one year no-cost extension to their grant: Alabama; California; Georgia; Hawaii; Illinois; Minnesota; Missouri; Ohio; Puerto Rico; and Wisconsin.

*While still waiting on a formal opinion from OJP's Office of General Counsel, it is our belief that upon the expiration of the grants, any deobligated funds will revert to OJP for use by the OAAG.

MEMORANDUM FOR HEADS OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES

FROM: LINDA M. SPRINGER
Director

Subject: Post-Employment Restrictions

The grandfather provision for determining the applicability of certain post-employment conflict-of-interest restrictions to members of the Senior Executive Service (SES) and other individuals will expire on November 24, 2005. However, beginning November 25, 2005, an employee with a rate of basic pay equal to or greater than 86.5 percent of the rate for level II of the Executive Schedule (i.e., $140,217 in 2005) will continue to be subject to the post-employment restrictions in 18 U.S.C. 207(c).

On October 15, 2004, the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) published interim regulations (69 FR 61143) to implement section 1125(b) of Public Law 108-136 to establish a new salary-based threshold for determining the applicability of certain post-employment conflict-of-interest restrictions under 18 U.S.C. 207(c). (See OPM's regulations at http://www.opm.gov/fedregis/html/oct04.asp.) Section 1125(b)(1) amended 18 U.S.C. 207(c)(2)(A)(ii) to require SES members and other individuals who are paid at a rate of basic pay equal to or greater than 86.5 percent of the rate for level II of the Executive Schedule to be subject to the post-employment restrictions in 18 U.S.C. 207(c). The salary-based threshold became effective on January 11, 2004.

The law also included a grandfather provision in section 1125(b)(1) that applied to certain SES members and other individuals for a period of 2 years, through November 24, 2005. If such individuals, on November 23, 2003, were subject to 18 U.S.C. 207(c) and were employed in positions with a rate of basic pay, exclusive of locality payments under 5 U.S.C. 5304, equal to or greater than the rate of basic pay payable for former level 5 of the SES as of that date (i.e., $134,000), they were subject to the post-employment restrictions in 18 U.S.C. 207(c) until November 24, 2005, without regard to any subsequent changes in position or pay.

THE WHITE HOUSE

March 8, 2006

MEMORANDUM

TO: Harry S. Truman Scholarship Alumni

FROM: Janet Slaughter Eissenstat, Director

As a Truman Scholar you have already demonstrated your commitment to excellence; therefore, I want to introduce you to The President's Commission on White House Fellowships, one of our Nation's most prestigious programs for leadership and public service, and invite you to apply.

The White House Fellows Program is a non-partisan fellowship that offers exceptional young men and women a first-hand experience at the highest levels of the Federal government by working with senior White House and Cabinet officials. White House Fellows repay that privilege after their Fellowship year by working as private citizens on their public agendas and contributing to the Nation as future leaders.

Please find enclosed a brochure, DVD and sample application. If you have any questions, or would like further information about the Program please call our office at 202-395-4522 or visit our website at www.whitehouse.gov/fellows.

Dear Mr. Gorsuch:

Congratulations on your nomination to serve as a United States Circuit Judge for the Tenth Circuit.

As you may know, the Administrative Office was created to provide administrative and management support and services to the federal judiciary. Toward that end, we sponsor a judicial nominee orientation program that normally is scheduled in conjunction with your visit to Washington for your confirmation hearing. If you attend this one-day program, you will be briefed on various functions of this office and advised about a variety of matters that will require your attention upon confirmation.

Margaret A. Irving, Chief of the Article III Judges Division, will contact you to provide additional information about the orientation program and to set up an itinerary should you decide to attend. If you are unable to attend, Peggy and her staff will make other arrangements to ensure that you receive all relevant information regarding your appointment. If you have any questions, please call Ms. Irving at 202-502-1860.

Sincerely,

Leonidas Ralph Mecham

Dear Mr. Gorsuch:

Congratulations on your nomination to serve as a United States Circuit Judge for the Tenth Circuit. To assist you with your transition to this appointment, you are invited to attend an orientation sponsored by the Administrative Office (AO). The orientation normally is scheduled in conjunction with your confirmation hearing.

During the one-day orientation, key AO personnel will brief you on court and judicial administration, chambers staffing, pay and benefits (including health and life insurance plans, retirement, and survivor annuities), court and personal security issues, ethical concerns, and other matters. Additionally, the orientation addresses matters that will require your attention before taking the oath of office. You also will meet with senior officials of the Federal Judicial Center, the agency responsible for research and educational programs within the judiciary.

As soon as you learn your hearing date, please call Theresa E. Preston of my staff at (202) 502-1860. It is important that you contact Ms. Preston so that the program presenters can be notified and you can be provided any necessary information.

You have excellent court support available to you through Circuit Executive David J. Tighe at (303) 335-2829, Circuit Clerk Elisabeth A. Shumaker at (303) 335-2824, and Circuit Librarian J. Terry Hemming at (393) 844-3591. I encourage you to call them.

Of course, my staff and I also are available to address any immediate questions or concerns. Please call us at (202) 502-1860.

We wish you the best and look forward to talking with you soon.

Sincerely,

Margaret A. Irving

MEMORANDUM FOR THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL
DIRECTOR, FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION
DIRECTOR, EXECUTIVE OFFICE FOR U.S. ATTORNEYS
ALL UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS

FROM: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL ag

SUBJECT: Department of Justice's Task Force on Intellectual Property

On October 12, 2004, Attorney General John Ashcroft released the Report of the Department of Justice's Task Force on Intellectual Property. This Report, a copy of which is enclosed for your review, recognizes the tremendous accomplishments of the Department to address all aspects of intellectual property, including criminal, civil, and antitrust enforcement; international coordination; legislation; and prevention. In addition, the Report makes important recommendations to bolster investigative and prosecutorial resources, streamline global enforcement efforts, strengthen the law to protect intellectual property rights, and raise public awareness to prevent intellectual property crime.

On March 9, 2005, I announced my determination to continue the significant work of the Intellectual Property Task Force and fully implement the Task Force's recommendations. I am confident that by implementing the recommendations put forward in the Report, the Department of Justice will build the strongest, most aggressive program against intellectual property crime in our Nation's history.

I have appointed my Deputy Chief of Staff and Counselor, Kyle Sampson, to lead this effort as the Task Force's new Chairman. Over the next several months, he will work closely with you to continue our aggressive efforts to combat the evolving challenge of intellectual property crime.

I thank the Task Force, the Task Force's staff, and all who contributed to the Report for their hard work, insight, and support in producing a remarkable plan to further strengthen our commitment to protect our Nation's creative and intellectual resources. I also thank you for your active participation in the implementation of this important effort.

United States Interagency Council on Homelessness

Mission. Revitalized by President Bush in 2002 and under the leadership of Executive Director Philip F. Mangano, the mission of the United States Interagency Council on Homelessness is to develop and implement a comprehensive national strategy to end chronic homelessness in the United States through interagency, intergovernmental, and intercommunity collaborations.

In its initiatives, the Council partners with federal, state, and local government, advocates, providers, and consumers to:

- Eliminate chronic homelessness through the development and implementation of jurisdictional 10-year plans to end chronic homelessness
- Undertake prevention and intervention using evidence-based and results-oriented approaches
- Collaborate at the interagency, intra-agency, and intergovernmental levels
- Identify innovation driven by data, research, and consumer preference, leading to performance-based outcomes
- Access mainstream resources for the benefit of homeless persons and families

The Interagency Council works to improve access to and coordination of federal investments among its federal member departments and agencies; ensure the effectiveness of federal activities and programs; engage and assist state and local governments, advocates, service providers, and customers in creating effective local solutions; and provide technical assistance and evidence-based best practice information to partners at every level of government and in every sector of partnership through its weekly e-news and Web site.

Interagency Collaboration - Federal. The Council is an independent agency within the federal executive composed of twenty Cabinet Secretaries and agency heads. Meeting regularly at the White House, the Interagency Council is currently chaired by Department of Veterans Affairs Secretary James Nicholson. The Vice-chair is Department of Labor Secretary Elaine Chao.

Intergovernmental Collaboration. As part of the Council's strategy to establish intergovernmental partnerships to end chronic homelessness, specific initiatives have been fostered with state and local government. To date, Governors of 53 states and territories have taken steps to create State Interagency Councils on Homelessness. Almost 200 Mayors and County Executives are underway with 10-Year Plans to End Chronic Homelessness.

Intercommunity Collaboration. To carry out the strategy of intergovernmental and inter-sector partnership, the Council has developed community partnerships with the National Governors Association, U.S. Conference of Mayors, National League of Cities, National Association of Counties, United Way, Chamber of Commerce, International Downtown Association, National Alliance for the Mentally Ill, and the National Alliance to End Homelessness.

Technical Assistance and Support. To administer and facilitate the Council's mission at the local and regional level, the Interagency Council has Regional Coordinators throughout the country. Each of the Coordinators is responsible for working with federal partners and state and local governments, homeless advocates, providers, and consumers to encourage and coordinate their collective efforts to end chronic homelessness. The Coordinators foster the creation of state and regional federal interagency councils and disseminate innovations and best practice information.

JUSTICE DEPARTMENT FILES LAWSUIT TO DEFEND EMPLOYMENT RIGHTS OF ARMY RESERVIST

WASHINGTON, D.C. - The Justice Department today announced the filing of a lawsuit against International Ethical Laboratories, Inc. (IEL), alleging violations of the Uniformed Services Employment and Re-employment Rights Act of 1994 (USERRA). The complaint, filed in the U.S. District Court for Puerto Rico, alleges that IEL violated USERRA by denying Benito A. Colon Ortiz re-employment rights upon his return from military service, and by discharging Mr. Colon.

"This lawsuit reflects the Justice Department's ongoing commitment to ensure that employment rights of the men and women of our military are protected when they return from duty," said R. Alexander Acosta, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. "No person should be denied an employment opportunity because of his or her decision to don the nation's uniform."

According to the government's complaint, Mr. Colon served as a sergeant in the Army National Guard from 1991 to 2000. He was hired by IEL as a pharmaceutical sales representative in January 2003. While employed with IEL, Mr. Colon re-enlisted in the Army National Guard in January 2004 and attended its officer basic training course until March 2004. He then sought but was denied re-employment with IEL.

In its complaint, the Justice Department is asking that the court order IEL to reinstate Mr. Colon, pay him for his loss of earnings and pre-judgment interest, and pay him liquidated damages in an amount equal to his lost earnings.

The Justice Department's lawsuit was filed after the Veterans' Employment and Training Service (VETS) of the Labor Department referred Mr. Colon's complaint to the Justice Department upon completion of its investigation and failed settlement efforts.

This is the second USERRA complaint filed by the Justice Department since the Civil Rights Division received enforcement authority for USERRA cases in September 2004. To learn more about USERRA, go to http:www.dol.gov/vets/programs/userra/main.htm.

JUSTICE DEPARTMENT SECURES INJUNCTION PROTECTING RIGHTS OF OVERSEAS CITIZENS TO VOTE IN JULY 20TH FEDERAL PRIMARY ELECTION IN GEORGIA

WASHINGTON, D.C. - A federal court in Atlanta entered an order today granting the Justice Department's request for emergency relief to ensure overseas uniformed and civilian voters can vote in Georgia's July 20 federal primary election.

"We are very pleased that the court took such prompt action on this matter," said R. Alexander Acosta, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. "As a result, the rights of Georgians overseas, particularly those serving in and protecting democracy with the armed forces are more secure. We will continue to protect vigorously the rights of all voters to equal and open ballot access."

The Department filed suit on July 13 after election officials in many Georgia counties failed to mail requested absentee ballots to citizens living overseas with sufficient time to allow them to vote in the July 20 federal primary election, as required by the federal Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act ("UOCAVA"). After an emergency hearing in Atlanta on July 14, the court announced it would require immediate steps to ensure that qualified overseas voters have a reasonable opportunity to vote.

Judge Pannell's order, signed Thursday evening, extends the deadline by which qualified overseas ballots may be accepted from July 20 to July 23. It permits overseas voters to receive and return their ballots by fax, electronic mail, or express mail at the state's expense. It permits voters to use a federal write-in absentee ballot if they do not receive their state absentee ballot in time. Federal write-in ballots are widely available at military bases and embassies around the world. The federal write-in ballot is authorized by the UOCAVA as a "back-up" ballot if voters do not receive their state ballots for federal general elections on time. The court also ordered that voters whose ballots were sent out after July 23 be personally notified of the order.

The order extends the same emergency voting opportunities to any runoff that may be necessary. Were a federal primary runoff necessary, it would occur August 10, leaving insufficient time for overseas voters to participate by regular mail. Also, an order was entered simultaneously today in the state's 2003 redistricting lawsuit extending the same relief to overseas voters who wish to vote for state offices in the July 20 or August 10 elections.

UOCAVA requires states to allow uniformed services voters and other overseas citizens to register to vote and vote absentee for all elections for federal office. The Justice Department has brought numerous federal lawsuits under the UOCAVA to ensure that overseas voters are not deprived of an opportunity to vote due to late mailing of absentee ballots by election officials. The Department recently obtained an emergency order in Pennsylvania extending the deadline for return of absentee ballots in Pennsylvania's April 27 primary election, and worked with state and local officials in Alabama to remedy a problem caused by a county's late mailing of absentee ballots for the June 1 primary election.

More information about the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act and other federal voting laws is available on the Department of Justice website, www.usdoj.gov. Complaints about discriminatory voting practices may be called in to the Voting Section of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division at 1-800-253-3931.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE MIDDLE DISTRICT OF TENNESSEE
NASHVILLE DIVISION

CHARLES W. GOODREAU, Plaintiff, v. BRIDGESTONE / FIRESTONE NORTH AMERICAN TIRE, LLC, Defendant.	Civil Action No. 3 05 0263 JURY DEMAND JUDGE HAYNES

COMPLAINT

Plaintiff, Charles W. Goodreau ("Goodreau"), by the undersigned attorneys, makes the following averments:

1. This is a civil action brought pursuant to the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act of 1994, 38 U.S.C. §§ 4301 - 4333 ("USERRA").

JURISDICTION AND VENUE

2. This Court has jurisdiction over the subject matter of this action pursuant to 38 U.S.C. § 4323(b).

3. Venue is proper in this district under 38 U.S.C. § 4323(c)(2) and 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b) because Defendant, Bridgestone / Firestone North American Tire, LLC ("Bridgestone"), maintains a place of business in this judicial district.

PARTIES

4. Goodreau resides at 241A Blue Hill Drive, Nashville, Tennessee 37214, within the jurisdiction of this Court.

5. Bridgestone maintains a place of business at 535 Marriott Drive, Nashville, Tennessee 37214. Nashville is in Davidson County. Bridgestone also maintains a place of business at its plant in Clarksville, Tennessee. Clarksville is in Montgomery County. Both Davidson County and Montgomery County are within the jurisdiction of this Court.

CLAIM FOR RELIEF

6. Goodreau enlisted in the United States Army in 1980. He was honorably discharged in 1992. On August 5, 2000, Goodreau joined the Army National Guard.

7. On May 29, 2002 Goodreau commenced employment for Bridgestone at its plant in Clarksville, Tennessee, as an Operator Banbury.

8. Bridgestone has a progressive pay schedule which is a step rate compensation system based on time at work. Bridgestone has the following progressive pay schedule for employees such as Goodreau: 70% for 1-179 days; 75% on and after 180 days; 80% on and after 360 days; 85% on and after 540 days; 90% on and after 720 days; 95% on and after 900 days; and 100% on and after 1,080 days.

9. Goodreau was hired at a pay rate of $16.14 per hour, or 70% of the applicable wage rate, on Bridgestone's progressive pay schedule. Goodreau was moved to $17.44 per hour, or 75% of the applicable wage rate, on November 24, 2002.

10. Goodreau was activated as a member of the Army National Guard under Operation Enduring Freedom / Iraqi Freedom from December 27, 2002 to March 24, 2004, for a total of approximately 453 days.

11. Upon his return to Bridgestone from service, in late March 2004, Goodreau was paid the same pay rate of $17.44 per hour that he was receiving when he went on active duty. Goodreau was moved to $18.60 per hour, or 80% of the applicable wage rate, on August 17, 2004.

12. Bridgestone violated Section 4316 of USERRA, among other ways, by denying Goodreau an advancement of approximately 453 days on its progressive pay schedule and other employment benefits due to his membership in, or obligation to perform service in, the uniformed services.

13. As a result of Bridgestone's unlawful denial of advancement to Goodreau on Bridgestone's progressive pay schedule, Goodreau has suffered loss of earnings and other benefits of employment.

PRAYER FOR RELIEF

WHEREFORE, Goodreau prays that the Court enter judgment against Bridgestone, its officers, agents, employees, successors and all persons in active concert or participation with it, as follows:

14. Declare that Bridgestone's denial of advancement to Goodreau on its progressive pay schedule was unlawful and in violation of USERRA;

15. Require that Bridgestone fully comply with the provisions of USERRA by reinstating Goodreau at the level of seniority, status and compensation that he would have enjoyed had he remained employed continuously with Bridgestone, and by paying Goodreau for his loss of wages and other benefits suffered by reason of Bridgestone's failure or refusal to comply with the provisions of this law;

DOJ_NMG_0143437

16. Enjoin Bridgestone from taking any action against Goodreau that fails to comply with the provisions of USERRA;

17. Award Goodreau prejudgment interest on the amount of lost wages found due; and

18. Grant such other and further relief as may be just and proper.

BRIDGESTONE / FIRESTONE NORTH AMERICAN TIRE, LLC,

Defendant.

Civil Action No. 3 05 - 0252

JUDGE HAYNES

CONSENT DECREE

This matter is before the Court for entry of this judgment by consent of all parties to effectuate a compromise and settlement of all claims. After review and consideration, the Court believes that entry of this judgment is in the interest of justice.

1. Plaintiff, Charles W. Goodreau ("Goodreau"), commenced this action in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Tennessee, Nashville Division, alleging that Defendant Bridgestone / Firestone North American Tire, LLC ("Bridgestone") violated the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act of 1994 ("USERRA") by denying Goodreau advancement on its progressive pay schedule and other employment benefits due to Goodreau's membership in, or obligation to perform service in, the uniformed services.

2. As a result of settlement discussions, Goodreau and Bridgestone have resolved their differences and have agreed that this action should be settled by entry of this Consent Decree. It is the intent of the parties that this Consent Decree be a final and binding settlement in full disposition of any and all claims alleged against Bridgestone that could have been alleged in the Complaint filed on behalf of Goodreau. Goodreau, by his signature to this document and the attached release, has indicated his acceptance of the terms and conditions contained in this Consent Decree.

This document was entered on the docket in compliance with Rule 58 and/or Rule 79(a)

STIPULATED FACTS

3. Pursuant to USERRA, the parties acknowledge the jurisdiction of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Tennessee (Nashville Division) over the subject matter of this action and of the parties to this case for the purpose of entering this Decree and, if necessary, enforcing this Decree.

4. Venue is proper in this district for purposes of this Decree and any proceedings related to this Decree only. Bridgestone agrees that all statutory conditions precedent to the institution of this lawsuit have been fulfilled.

FINDINGS

5. Having examined the terms and provisions of the Consent Decree, the Court finds the following:

a. The Court has jurisdiction over the subject matter of this action and the parties to this action.

b. The terms and provisions of this Consent Decree are fair, reasonable, and just. The rights of Bridgestone and Goodreau are protected adequately by this Decree.

c. This Consent Decree conforms with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and USERRA, and is not in derogation of the rights and privileges of any person. The entry of this Consent Decree will further the objectives of the USERRA and other applicable law, and will be in the best interests of the parties.

NOW, THEREFORE, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED AS FOLLOWS:

NON-ADMISSION

6. This Decree, being entered with the consent of the United States Department of Justice – Civil Rights Division, Goodreau, and Bridgestone, shall not constitute an adjudication or finding on the merits of the case and shall not be construed as an admission by Bridgestone of any violations of USERRA, or any other law, rule or regulation dealing with or in connection with equal employment opportunities. Bridgestone denies any wrongdoing.

NON-RETALIATION

7. Bridgestone shall not take any action against any person that constitutes retaliation or interference with the exercise of such person's rights under USERRA, or Goodreau's claim herein that forms the basis for the present case, or because such person gave testimony or assistance or participated in any manner in any investigation or proceeding in connection with this case.

REMEDIAL REQUIREMENTS

8. Bridgestone shall grant Goodreau the level of seniority, status and compensation that he would have enjoyed had he remained employed continuously with Bridgestone during the time of his active duty service in the military, i.e., on or about December 27, 2002 through on or about March 24, 2004, including loss of wages, with interest, in the amount of $6,128.00. Bridgestone shall provide documentary evidence of having paid Goodreau and credited him with the above benefits by mailing the same to the following address within fourteen (14) days after this Consent Decree has been entered by the Court:

DISPUTE RESOLUTION AND COMPLIANCE

9. The Court shall retain jurisdiction and will have all available equitable powers, including injunctive relief, to enforce this Decree. Upon motion of either party, the Court may schedule a hearing for the purpose of reviewing compliance with this Decree. The parties shall engage in good faith efforts to resolve any dispute concerning compliance prior to seeking review by the Court. The parties shall be required to give notice to each other ten (10) days before moving for review by the Court. All parties may conduct expedited discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for the purpose of determining compliance with this Decree or defending against a claim of non-compliance.

MISCELLANEOUS

10. All parties shall bear their own costs and expenses of litigation, including attorneys' fees.

11. This Consent Decree constitutes the entry of final judgment within the meaning of Rule 54 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on all claims asserted in or that could have been asserted by Goodreau in this action. The Court retains jurisdiction over this matter, however, for the purpose of entering appropriate orders interpreting and enforcing this judgment.

12. If any provision of this Consent Decree is found to be unlawful, only the specific provision in question shall be affected and the other provisions will remain in full force and effect.

13. The terms of this Consent Decree are and shall be binding upon the present and future owners, officers, directors, employees, creditors, agents, trustees, administrators, successors, representatives, and assigns of Bridgestone and upon the heirs, successors, and assigns of Goodreau.

14. This Consent Decree constitutes the entire agreement and commitments of the parties. Any modifications to this Decree must be mutually agreed upon and memorialized in a writing signed by Bridgestone and Goodreau.

EFFECTIVE DATE

15. The effective date of this Consent Decree shall be the date upon which it is entered by the Court.

16. This Consent Decree shall expire, and this action shall be dismissed, without further order of this Court one year from the date of entry of this Consent Decree. Goodreau, by and through his attorneys, may move, for good cause, to extend the Consent Decree if the remedial relief called for herein has not been effectuated. The Consent Decree will not be extended, however, unless the Court grants Goodreau's motion. Any such extension may be granted by the Court only for such time as is necessary to effectuate the relief set forth in this Consent Decree.

APPROVED and ORDERED this 4th day of April, 2005.

BENITO A. COLON ORTIZ, Plaintiff, v. INTERNATIONAL ETHICAL LABORATORIES, INC., Defendant.	Civil Action No. 05-1267(HL) Jury Trial Demanded

COMPLAINT

Plaintiff, Benito A. Colon Ortiz ("Colon"), by the undersigned attorneys, makes the following averments:

1. This civil action is brought pursuant to the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act of 1994, 38 U.S.C. §§ 4301 - 4333 ("USERRA").

JURISDICTION AND VENUE

2. This Court has jurisdiction over the subject matter of this action pursuant to 38 U.S.C. § 4323(b).

3. Venue is proper in this district under 38 U.S.C. § 4323(c)(2) and 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b) because Defendant, International Ethical Laboratories, Inc. ("IEL"), maintains a place of business in this judicial district.

PARTIES

4. Colon resides at Genis Corbalan 732, Fairview, Cupey, Puerto Rico 00926, within the jurisdiction of this Court.

5. IEL maintain a place of business at 1021 Americo Miranda Avenue, Reparto Metropolitano, Rio Piedras, Puerto Rico 00921, within the jurisdiction of this Court.

CLAIM FOR RELIEF

6. Colon served as an E-4 Specialist in the Army National Guard from 1991 to 2000. In this capacity, Colon performed military duties one weekend a month and two weeks each summer.

7. In January 2003, Colon commenced full-time employment as a pharmaceutical sales representative with IEL.

8. In January 2004, during his employment with IEL, Colon re-enlisted in the Army National Guard and received written orders to report for active duty to attend a 57-day officer basic training course that was scheduled to begin on January 31, 2004. Colon provided oral and written notice to IEL of his written orders to report for active duty.

9. Colon reported for active duty and attended the officer basic training course from January 31, 2004 to March 28, 2004.

10. On March 29, 2004, Colon attempted to return to work at IEL, but was denied reemployment. IEL discharged Colon on April 2, 2004.

11. IEL violated Sections 4311 and 4312 of USERRA, among other ways, by discriminating against Colon, denying him reemployment and other employment benefits, and discharging him because of his membership in, or obligation to perform service in, the uniformed services.

12. IEL's violations of USERRA were willful.

13. As a result of IEL's unlawful denial of Colon's reemployment and his discharge, Colon has suffered substantial loss of earnings and other benefits of employment.

DOJ_NMG_0143448

PRAYER FOR RELIEF

WHEREFORE, Colon prays that the Court enter judgment against IEL, its officers, agents, employees, successors and all persons in active concert or participation with it, as follows:

14. Declare that IEL's denial of reemployment to, and discharge of, Colon were unlawful and in violation of USERRA;

15. Order that IEL fully comply with the provisions of USERRA by reinstating Colon at the level of seniority, status and compensation that he would have enjoyed had he remained employed continuously with IEL, and by paying Colon for his loss of earnings and other benefits suffered by reason of IEL's failure or refusal to comply with the provisions of this law;

16. Declare that IEL's violations of USERRA were willful;

17. Order that IEL pay Colon as liquidated damages an amount equal to the amount of his lost compensation and other benefits suffered by reason of IEL's willful violations of USERRA;

18. Enjoin IEL from taking any action against Colon that fails to comply with the provisions of USERRA;

19. Award Colon prejudgment interest on the amount of lost compensation found due; and

20. Grant such other and further relief as may be just and proper.

NEWARK DIVISION

ANTHONY K. LINCOLN, Plaintiff, v. FIRST EXPRESS, INC., Defendant.

Civil Action No. 05-2742 (WJM)

JURY DEMAND

COMPLAINT

Plaintiff, Anthony K. Lincoln ("Lincoln"), by the undersigned attorneys, makes the following averments:

1. This is a civil action brought pursuant to the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act of 1994, 38 U.S.C. §§ 4301 - 4333 ("USERRA").

JURISDICTION AND VENUE

2. This Court has jurisdiction over the subject matter of this action pursuant to 38 U.S.C. § 4323(b).

3. Venue is proper in this district under 38 U.S.C. § 4323(c)(2) and 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b) because Defendant, First Express, Inc. ("First Express"), maintains a place of business in this judicial district.

PARTIES

4. Lincoln resides at 1945 JFK Boulevard, Jersey City, New Jersey, within the jurisdiction of this Court.

5. First Express maintains a place of business at 97 Third Street, South Kearny, New Jersey 07032. South Kearny is in Hudson County, and is within the jurisdiction of this Court.

CLAIM FOR RELIEF

6. Lincoln joined the United States Army National Guard on or about December 30, 1997. He is a member of the E Company, 50th MFB, located at 678 Montgomery Street, Jersey City, New Jersey 07306.

7. On or about June 30, 2003, Lincoln commenced employment for First Express as a truck driver.

8. On or about May 3, 2004, Lincoln informed First Express, through Steve Won, its owner ("Won"), that he expected to be activated as a member of the Army National Guard in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom within the following month. Lincoln also informed First Express, through Won, of his interest in returning to his position as truck driver upon his discharge from active duty military service. Won of First Express told Lincoln to contact First Express when he returned home from active duty.

9. On or about May 24, 2004, Lincoln again provided verbal notification to First Express, through Won, of his impending military deployment.

10. By orders issued on June 2, 2004, Lincoln was ordered to active duty as a member of his Reserve Component Unit for a period not to exceed 545 days. He was also ordered to active duty for a period of no less than thirty days for mobilization processing, which was to include medical and dental screening and care.

11. On June 6, 2004, Lincoln reported to his Home Unit Station pursuant to his military orders. He then reported to Fort Dix on June 9, 2004, for mobilization processing pursuant to those orders.

12. Lincoln was released from active duty on June 22, 2004, for medical reasons.

13. On that same day, June 22, 2004, Lincoln contacted First Express, through Won, by telephone seeking reinstatement to his truck driver position with First Express. Won told Lincoln to call back in a couple of days.

14. On June 24, 2004, Lincoln contacted Won of First Express, as instructed, and was told by Won that First Express had permanently replaced him with another truck driver.

15. On July 12, 2004, Lincoln filed a complaint against First Express under USERRA with the Veterans' Employment and Training Services ("VETS") of the United States Department of Labor.

16. On July 19, 2004, a VETS investigator contacted First Express with regard to Lincoln's USERRA complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0143453

17. First Express did not allow Lincoln to work with First Express until August 18, 2004.

18. First Express has refused to pay Lincoln the wages he would have earned had First Express promptly reemployed Lincoln upon his completion of active military service.

19. First Express violated USERRA, among other ways, by denying Lincoln prompt reemployment and the wages he would have earned from such prompt reemployment, after his completion of active military service in the uniformed services.

20. First Express' violations of USERRA were willful.

21. As a result of First Express' unlawful denial of Lincoln's request for prompt reemployment, and the wages he would have received from such prompt reemployment, Lincoln has suffered a loss of earnings.

PRAYER FOR RELIEF

WHEREFORE, Lincoln prays that the Court enter judgment against First Express, its officers, agents, employees, successors and all persons in active concert or participation with it, as follows:

22. Declare that First Express' denial of prompt reemployment to Lincoln was unlawful and in violation of USERRA;

23. Require that First Express fully comply with the provisions of USERRA by paying Lincoln for his loss of wages suffered by reason of First Express' failure or refusal to comply with the provisions of this law;

24. Declare that First Express' violations of USERRA were willful;

25. Order that First Express pay Lincoln as liquidated damages an amount equal to the amount of his lost wages suffered by reason of First Express' willful violations of USERRA;

DOJ_NMG_0143454

26. Enjoin First Express from taking any action against Lincoln that fails to comply with the provisions of USERRA;

27. Award Lincoln prejudgment interest on the amount of lost wages found due; and

28. Grant such other and further relief as may be just and proper.

Dear Robert:

I appreciate your taking the time to consider passing this letter on to Dr. David J. Brailer, who is leading the administration's initiative to increase the use of electronic health records in this country.

I recently downloaded the Google desktop software to a new computer at my house. Google is one of several companies which provide free software which make it easier and more efficient for the user to look for files maintained on a personal computer. After downloading this software, I then accessed via the Internet some medical information on several patients I was seeing in the hospital; this was done using an Internet connection to the hospital's server. The intention with this system is that the information is kept on the server and not downloaded to the PC of the user who is accessing the information online. After disconnecting from the hospital's system, I then found that by typing in information such as the patient's name in the Google search box, I was able to retrieve the web pages that I had seen from my computer's hard drive. My concern is that these desktop search programs, which do provide a significant benefit, are likely to be downloaded by a large number of people who will not appreciate their impact on the ability to maintain confidentiality of patient information. I assume that the large health care system where I am now employed will be able to deal with vendors which we utilize and come up with a solution; however, I think that smaller practices, without such resources, are unlikely to develop solutions for this problem, assuming that they even realize that it exists. I have spoken with two physicians who work in the field of medical informatics at large institutions who had not been aware of this issue. (My delay in getting this to you after our conversation was in the hope that one of them might have some thoughts on dealing with this matter which I could pass on).

In view of the movement towards the use of electronic medical records, I thought this is an issue which might merit Dr. Brailer's attention. I know that in my readings I haven't seen anything dealing with this specific security issue.

While my initial concern relating to the desk top search software was related to the effect on confidentiality of medical information, this issue would also have implications for those in other fields who remotely access confidential information from a server.

Thank you very much for taking the time to consider passing this information on, when I know you are busy dealing with so many more important issues. If you have any questions, I can be contacted at 770-732-1055 or via email at Steven.Cohen@Wellstar.org.

I hope you are enjoying your time in Washington and that you and your family are doing well.

Dear Judge, Kyle, and Courtney:

I'm still very much settling in here (as you can see, no stationery yet!), but I wanted to take a moment to express my heartfelt gratitude to you for the many kindnesses you have shown me. You've given me two tremendous opportunities to serve, first working at the Department and for the President, an experience I will always cherish and recall as a highlight of my professional life, and now an opportunity to return to serve the people of the West that I love. I am not sure I will ever be able to say thank you adequately, but I very much hope to prove worthy of the trust and responsibility you've reposed in me.

As you know, I deeply admire the work you are doing to keep the American people safe and a significant part of me misses being a part of your team in that effort. If ever I can be of any help, please do let me know. And please do let me know if and when your travels take you through Denver. I very much hope our paths cross soon and often over the years, and I am delighted and honored that the Judge will be able to make my investiture on November 20; I look forward to seeing you then.

With all my thanks and warmest regards,

Dear Judge Gonzales:

Thank you so much for taking the time and trouble to speak at my investiture. You honored me and my family so greatly by your participation and kind words; I hope to live up to the great trust you have placed in me. And it was such a pleasure to see you, Kyle, Courtney, and so much of the DOJ team again – I confess it made me a little "homesick" for the Department.

David Ebel commented the other day that you sounded interested in a fly fishing expedition. I have a little place about two hours from Denver with a modest stretch of the Colorado river. If ever you or your family would like to visit for fishing, hiking, or skiing (nearby), Louise and I would love to have you. I have made a similar offer to Kyle and Courtney and very much hope one of you will take me up on it!

I wish you and the entire DOJ community the very best for the holidays and thank you again so much for honoring me with your presence last week.

Warmest regards,

House of Representatives,

Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism, and Homeland Security, Committee on the Judiciary,

Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 12:00 p.m., in Room 2141, Rayburn House Office Building, Hon. Howard Coble [chairman of the subcommittee] presiding.

Mr. COBLE. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. We welcome you to this important oversight hearing on white collar crime and the issue of the attorney-client privilege and waivers by corporations in criminal investigations.

At first blush, some may say that this topic is an arcane legal issue with little relevance to the general public. In fact, the attorney-client privilege is deeply rooted in our values and the legal profession. It encourages openness and honesty between clients and their attorneys so that clients hopefully can receive effective advice and counsel.

But this privilege is not inviolate. When it comes to corporate crime, there is and probably always will be an institutional tension between preserving corporate attorney-client and work product privileges and a prosecutor's quest to unearth the truth about criminal acts.

I know that one of the most important engines in our criminal justice system is cooperation. By encouraging and rewarding cooperation, prosecutors are able to unearth sophisticated fraud schemes which cause devastating harm to investors and employees and undermine our faith in the markets.

But the possible benefits of cooperation cannot be used to support a prosecutor's laundry list of demands for a cooperating corporation. Prosecutors must be zealous and vigorous in their efforts to bring corporate actors to justice. However, zeal does not in my opinion equate with coercion in fair enforcement of these laws.

To me, the important question is whether prosecutors seeking to investigate corporate crimes can gain access to the information without requiring a waiver of the attorney-client privilege. There is no excuse for prosecutors to require privilege waivers as a routine matter, it seems to me.

The subcommittee will examine the important issue with a keen eye to determine whether Federal prosecutors are routinely requiring cooperating corporations to waive such privilege. Then-Acting Deputy Attorney General McCallum issued a memorandum on October 21, 2005 which mandated a change in Justice Department policy to try to establish a more uniform review procedure for any such requirement imposed by a prosecutor.

This is a welcome development, and the subcommittee is interested in determining how that policy has been implemented. I am also aware of the fact that the Sentencing Commission is examining its current policy of encouraging such waivers when determining the nature and extent of cooperation.

While the guidelines do not explicitly mandate a waiver of privileges for the full benefit of cooperation, in practical terms we have to make sure that they do not operate to impose such a requirement. Our subcommittee needs to examine this issue, work closely with the Sentencing Commission, the defense bar, and the Justice Department to make sure that a fair balance is struck.

I look forward to hearing from our distinguished panel of witnesses today, and I am now pleased to recognize the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, the Ranking Member of the subcommittee, Mr. Bobby Scott.

[The statement of Mr. Coble follows:]

* SUBCOMMITTEE INSERT **********

Mr. SCOTT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I want to thank you for holding this hearing on attorney-client privilege and corporate waivers of that privilege.

Attorney-client privilege is more usually associated with the context of protecting an individual from having to disclose communications with his or her lawyer for the purpose of criminal or civil prosecution, corporations or persons, for the sake of legal processes that are also entitled to attorney-client privilege.

As noted by the United States Supreme Court in Upjohn vs. U.S., the attorney-client privilege is the oldest of privileges for confidential communications known to common law. Its purpose is to encourage full and frank communications between attorneys and their clients so that sound legal advice and advocacy can be given by counsel. Such advice or activity depends upon the lawyer being fully informed by the client.

As noted in other cases, the lawyer-client privilege rests on the need for the advocate and counselor to know all that relates to the client's reasons for seeking representation if the professional mission is to be carried out. This purpose can only be effectively carried out when the client is free from consequences or apprehensions regarding the possibility of disclosure of the information.

Exceptions to protections of the attorney--excuse me.

Exceptions to the protections of the privilege do exist, but they have generally been limited to the crime-fraud exception, which holds that the privilege does not apply to an attorney-client communication in furtherance of a crime, or other cases where the client has already waived the privilege through disclosure to a non-privileged third party.

Now it appears that the Department of Justice has determined that there may be another exception, that is, when it wishes the corporation to waive the privilege in the context of a criminal investigation. For some time now I have been concerned about reports that the Department of Justice is coercing corporations to waive their attorney-client privilege during criminal investigations of the corporation and its employees by making waiver a prerequisite for consideration by the Department and its recommendation for not challenging leniency should criminal conduct be established.

Now, this is particularly significant because under mandatory minimums and sentencing guidelines, prosecutorial motions for leniency may be the only way to get a sentence under the mandatory minimum. So in this case, a prosecutor often has more control over sentencing than the judge.

While the attorney-client privilege doctrine does apply to corporations, complications arise when the client is a corporation since the corporate privilege has to be asserted by persons who may themselves be the target of a criminal investigation or subject to criminal charges based on the disclosed attorney-client information. Disclosed information can be used either in criminal prosecutions or civil prosecutions. Whatever fiduciary duty an official may have to the corporation and its shareholders, it is probably superseded by the official's own self-interest in the criminal investigation.

And there is no protection for employees of the corporation against waivers of the attorney-client privilege by officials who may have their own self-interest at heart. This includes information provided by employees to corporate counsel to assist internal investigations by the corporation, even if the information was under threat of an employee being fired and even if the information constituted self-incrimination by the employee.

It is one thing for officials of a corporation to break the attorney-client privilege in their own self-interest by their own volition. It is another thing for the Department to require or coerce it by making leniency considerations contingent upon it, even when it is merely on a fishing expedition on the part of the Department. Complaints have indicated that the practice of requiring a waiver of the corporate attorney-client privilege has become routine. And, of course, why wouldn't it be the case? What is the advantage to the Department of not requiring a waiver in the corporate investigation?

Now, because of the exclusionary rule, when a confession is coerced or a search is conducted illegally, anything that is found of that becomes fruit of a poisonous tree and can't be used in a criminal prosecution. So police and prosecutors who jeopardize the case by such tainted evidence are generally disparaged by their colleagues, and thus there is a disincentive for them to pursue and collect such evidence in the first place. There is no incentive to collect evidence if it is going to ruin the case.

Although coerced confessions and illegal searches are always improper, before the exclusionary rule there was an incentive for police to coerce confessions and illegally obtain information because they could make a case based on it, and there was no penalty.

Here we have the same incentives with respect to the waiver of corporate privilege. So, not surprisingly, reports are the demand for waivers are rising, not only by the Department but by other entities as well, such as auditors as a prerequisite of issuing a clean audit.

Now, coercing corporate attorney-client privileges has not been--has not long been the practice in the Department. It has really been the last two administrations that have practiced this, and it has been growing by leaps and bounds.

Corporate attorney-client privilege has not always been the prerequisite for leniency. Providing non-privileged documents and information and providing broad access to corporate premises and employees have been traditional ways to receive benefits of corporate cooperation.

Some nine U.S. Attorneys General, Deputy Attorneys General, and Solicitors General have expressed their concerns about the current Departmental waiver policy. We will hear from witnesses today who have prosecuted corporate cases without requiring such waiver. And so, Mr. Chairman, we look forward to the testimony by witnesses and to working with you to address the concerns regarding the Department's corporate attorney-client waiver policy.

[The statement of Mr. Scott follows:]

* SUBCOMMITTEE INSERT **********

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Scott. And gentlemen, we have been joined by the distinguished gentleman from California, Mr. Lungren, the distinguished gentleman from Florida, Mr. Feeney, and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Delahunt.

Gentlemen, what I am about to do I am very awkward in doing it. It is customary for the subcommittee to administer the oath to the panelists. I know you all. I know you don't need to be sworn in to tell the truth. But if you don't mind, would each of you please stand and raise your hands.

Mr. COBLE. Let the record show each witness answered in the affirmative. And I have had the fear if I depart with you all, then the next panel is going to wonder why I don't depart from them. But you all, I am not worried about what you all say violating the truth in any way.

As I said before, we have four distinguished witnesses with us today. Our first witness is Mr. Robert McCallum, Jr., Associate Attorney General of the Department of Justice. In this capacity, Mr. McCallum advises and assists the Attorney General and the Deputy Attorney General in formulating policies pertaining to a broad range of civil justice, Federal and local law enforcement, and public safety matters. Prior to this appointment, he served as Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Division. Mr. McCallum received his undergraduate and law degrees from Yale University, and was a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford University.

Our second witness is returning to the Hill after some extended absence, the Honorable Dick Thornburgh of Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham. Mr. Thornburgh's distinguished public career extends over a quarter of a century. He previously served as Governor of Pennsylvania, Attorney General under Presidents Reagan and Bush, and Undersecretary General of the United Nations.

Mr. Thornburgh has been awarded honorary degrees by 31 colleges and universities, and previously served as Director of the Institute of Politics at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government. Mr. Thornburgh earned his undergraduate degree at Yale and his law degree at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law.

Our third witness is Mr. Thomas Donohue, President and CEO of the United States Chamber of Commerce. In his current capacity, Mr. Donohue has expanded the influence of the Chamber across the globe. He engaged the Chamber Institute for Legal Reform and revitalized the National Chamber Foundation. Previously, Mr. Donohue served for 13 years as President and CEO of the American Trucking Association, and was awarded his bachelors degree from St. Johns University and a masters degree from Adelphi University.

Our fourth and final witness today is Mr. William Sullivan, Jr., litigation partner at Winston & Strawn. In this capacity, Mr. Sullivan concentrates on corporate internal investigations, trial practice, white collar criminal defense, and complex securities litigation.

Previously, he served for over 10 years as an Assistant United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, and has worked in private practice as a litigator. Additionally, Mr. Sullivan has addressed the World Trade Organization on Sarbanes-Oxley issues. He received his bachelors and masters degrees from Tufts University and his law degree from Cornell University.

Gentlemen, it is good to have you all with us. And as we have previously told you, without hamstringing you too severely, we try to apply the 5-minute rule here. And when you all see that amber light on your panel appear, that tells you that the ice on which you are skating is becoming thin. You have about a minute to go. And we're not going to keelhaul anybody for violating it, but if you can wrap up in as close to 5 minutes as you can.

Mr. McCallum, why don't you kick us off.

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT D. McCALLUM, JR., ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE; HON. DICK THORNBURGH, KIRKPATRICK & LOCKHART NICHOLSON GRAHAM LLP; THOMAS J. DONOHUE, PRESIDENT AND CEO, U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE; AND WILLIAM M. SULLIVAN, JR., LITIGATION PARTNER, WINSTON & STRAWN

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT D. McCALLUM, JR.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Ranking Member Scott, and members of the committee. We appreciate at the Department of Justice this opportunity to appear before you today.

Now, President Bush, this Congress, and the American people have all embraced a zero tolerance policy when it comes to corporate fraud. In passing the landmark Sarbanes-Oxley legislation in 2002, Congress gave the Department of Justice clear marching orders: prosecute fully those who would use their positions of power and influence in corporate America to enrich themselves unlawfully, and thereby restore confidence in our financial markets.

And we have done exactly that, Mr. Chairman. From July 2002 through December 2005, the Department has secured more than 900 corporate fraud convictions, including 85 presidents, 82 chief executive officers, 40 chief financial officers, 14 chief operating officers, 17 corporate counsel or attorneys, and 98 vice presidents, as well as millions of dollars in damages for victims of fraud.

Much of our success depends on our ability to secure cooperation. As Chairman Sensenbrenner noted recently, and I quote, ''By encouraging and rewarding corporate cooperation, our laws serve the public interest in promoting corporate compliance, minimizing use of our enforcement resources, and leading to the prosecution and punishment of the most culpable actors.''

The Department's approach to corporate fraud is set forth in the so-called Thompson Memorandum, issued by Larry D. Thompson as Deputy Attorney General. Pursuant to that memorandum, the degree to which a corporation cooperates with a criminal investigation may be a factor to be considered by prosecutors when determining whether or not to charge the corporation with criminal misconduct.

Cooperation in turn depends on--and here I quote the Thompson Memorandum--''the corporation's willingness to identify the culprits within the corporation, including senior executives; to make witnesses available; to disclose the complete results of its internal investigation; and to waive attorney-client and work product protections.''

Some critics have suggested that the Department is contemptuous of legal privileges. Nothing could be further from the truth. We recognize the ability to communicate freely with counsel can serve legitimate and important functions and encourage responsible corporate stewardship and corporate governance.

But at the same time, we all must recognize that corporate fraud is often highly difficult to detect. Indeed, in recent years we have witnessed a series of highly complex corporate scandals which would have been difficult to prosecute in a timely and efficient manner without corporate cooperation, including in some instances the waiver of privileges.

The Thompson Memorandum carefully balances the legitimate interests furthered by the privilege, and the societal benefits of rigorous enforcement of the laws supporting ethical standards of conduct.

There is also a so-called McCallum Memorandum, issued during my tenure as Acting Deputy Attorney General last year, which adds to this balancing of the competing interests. The McCallum memorandum first ensures that no Federal prosecutor may request a waiver without supervisory review. And second, it requires each United States Office to institute a written waiver review policy governing such requests.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize that despite these limitations and restrictions, there are some critics of the Department's approach. While I look forward to addressing specific concerns of the members of this subcommittee that may occur during the questioning, let me make a few preliminary observations.

First, voluntary disclosure is but one factor in assessing cooperation, and cooperation in turn is but one factor among many considered in any charging decisions. Disclosures thus is not required to obtain credit for cooperation in all cases; cooperation may be had by corporations most readily without waiving anything, simply by identifying the employees best situated to provide the Government with relevant information.

Nor can the Government compel corporations to give waivers. Corporations are generally represented by sophisticated and accomplished counsel who are fully capable of calculating the benefits or harms of disclosures. Sometimes they agree; sometimes they do not agree. Whether to disclose information voluntarily always remains within the corporation's choice. And in fact, voluntary disclosures are frequently initiated by the corporate counsel and not by the Government.

Second, under our process, waivers of privileges should not be routinely sought, and we believe are not routinely sought. Indeed, they should be sought based upon a need for three things: timely, complete, and accurate information. And they should be requested pursuant to the established guidelines, and only with supervisory approval.

Third, our approach does not diminish a corporation's willingness to undertake investigations, in our view. Wholly apart from the Government's criminal investigations, corporate management owes to its shareholders, not to itself or to its employees, but to its shareholders, a fiduciary duty to investigate potential wrongdoing and to take corrective action. To the extent that shareholders are best served by timely internal investigations, responsible management will always do so.

And finally, in some jurisdictions, voluntary disclosure to the Government waives privileges in civil litigation seeking monetary damages, thus, it is said, compounding the corporation's litigation risk. Addressing this concern, the committee should be aware that the Evidence Committee of the Advisory Rules of the Judicial Conference is currently considering a rule that would limit use by others of privileged material voluntarily provided by a corporation in its cooperation with a Government investigation. We at the Department of Justice will be involved in the Federal Rules Advisory Committee on Evidence considering that, and we will watch that debate with interest.

In sum, Mr. Chairman, we believe that the Department has struck an appropriate balance between traditional privileges and the American people's legitimate law enforcement needs and the necessity of establishing standards.

Thank you for the opportunity to testify.

[The statement of Mr. McCallum follows:]

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. McCallum.

Mr. Thornburgh.

TESTIMONY OF HON. DICK THORNBURGH

Mr. THORNBURGH. Chairman Coble, Ranking Member Scott, members of the subcommittee, I want to thank you for the invitation to speak to you today about the grave dangers posed to the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine by current governmental policies and practices.

At the outset, let me commend you for being the first Congressional body to convene a hearing on this very worrisome situation. The attorney-client privilege, as we all know, is a fundamental element of the American system of justice, and I fear that we have all been too slow in recognizing how seriously the privilege has been undermined in the past several years by Government action. Your focus on this issue today is vitally needed and much appreciated.

The attorney-client privilege is the oldest of the evidentiary privileges originating in the common law of England in the 1500s. Although the privilege shields from disclosure evidence that might otherwise be admissible, courts have found that this potential loss of evidence is outweighed by the benefits to the immediate client, who receives better advice, and to society as a whole, which obtains the benefits of voluntary legal compliance.

These ideas have been embraced time and time again by our courts. In the words of the Supreme Court, the privilege encourages ''full and frank communication between attorneys and their clients, and thereby promotes broader public interest in the observance of law and the administration of justice.'' The attorney-client privilege is thus a core element in a law-abiding society and a well-ordered commercial world.

And yet the previously solid protection that attorney-client communications have enjoyed has been profoundly shaken by a trend in law enforcement for the Government to, in effect, demand a waiver of a corporation's privilege as a precondition for granting the benefits of cooperation that might prevent indictment or diminish punishment. These pressures emanate chiefly from the Department of Justice and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Beginning with the 1999 Holder Memorandum, and as more forcefully stated in the 2003 Thompson Memorandum, the Department of Justice has made clear its policy that waiver of the attorney-client and work product protections is an important element in determining whether a corporation may get favorable treatment for cooperation. The SEC, in a public report issued at the conclusion of an investigation, outlined a similar policy.

Finally, the U.S. Sentencing Commission in 2004 amended the commentary to its sentencing guidelines so that waiver of privilege becomes a significant factor in determining whether an organization has engaged in timely and thorough cooperation necessary for obtaining leniency. Following the Federal lead, State law enforcement officials are beginning to demand broad privilege waivers, as are self-regulatory organizations and the auditing profession.

While the tone of these documents may be moderate, and officials representing these entities stress their intent to implement them in reasonable ways, it has now become abundantly clear that in actual practice, these policies pose overwhelming temptations to prosecutors seeking to save time and resources and to target organizations desperate to save their very existence. And each waiver has a ripple effect that creates more demands for greater disclosures, both in individual cases and as a matter of practice. Once a corporation discloses a certain amount of information, then the bar is raised for the next situation, and each subsequent corporation will need to provide more information to be deemed cooperative.

The result is documented in a survey released just this week to which over 1400 in-house and outside counsel responded, in which almost 75 percent of both groups agreed--almost 40 percent agreeing strongly--that a culture of waiver has evolved in which Government agencies believe it is reasonable and appropriate for them to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or work product protections.

I practice law at a major firm with a significant white collar criminal defense practice. My partners generally report that they now encounter waiver requests in virtually every organizational criminal investigation in which they are involved. In their experience, waiver has become a standard expectation of Federal prosecutors. Others with whom I have spoken in the white collar defense bar tell me the same thing.

I am prepared to concede that the significance of these developments took some time to penetrate beyond the Beltway and the relatively small community of white collar defense lawyers. It is clear, however, that as the legal profession has become aware of the problem, it has resulted in a strong and impassioned defense of the attorney-client privilege and the work product protection.

This issue was the hottest topic at last summer's annual meeting of the American Bar Association, and at its conclusion, the ABA House of Delegates unanimously passed a resolution that strongly supports the preservation of the attorney-client privilege and opposes policies, practices, and procedures of Government bodies that have the effect of eroding the attorney-client privilege.

I was one of those nine former Department of Justice officials from both Republican and Democratic administrations who, as the Chairman noted, signed a letter to the Sentencing Commission last summer urging it to reconsider its recent amendment regarding waiver.

It is never a simple matter to enlist such endorsements, particularly in the summertime and on short notice. And yet it was not difficult at all to secure those nine signatures because all feel so strongly about the fundamental role the attorney-client privilege and work product protections play in our system of justice.

We feel just as strongly that the other governmental policies and practices outlined above seriously undermine those protections. As you know, I served as a Federal prosecutor for many years, and I supervised other Federal prosecutors in my capacities as U.S. Attorney, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division, and Attorney General of the United States. Throughout those years, requests to organizations we were investigating to hand over privileged information never came to my attention. One wonders what has changed in the past decade to warrant such a dramatic encroachment on the attorney-client privilege.

Clearly, in order to be deemed cooperative, an organization under investigation must provide to the Government all relevant factual information and documents in its possession, and it should assist the Government by explaining the relevant facts and identifying individuals with knowledge of them. But in doing so, it should not have to reveal privileged communications or attorney work product.

That limitation is necessary to maintain the primacy of those protections in our system of justice. It is a fair limitation on prosecutors, who have extraordinary powers to gather information for themselves. This balance is one I found workable in my years of Federal service, and it should be restored.

I was pleased to see the Sentencing Commission earlier this year request comment on whether it should delete or amend the commentary sentence regarding waiver. In testimony last fall, I urged it to provide affirmatively that waiver should not be a factor in assessing cooperation. I understand that the American Bar Association will shortly approach the Department of Justice with a request that the Thompson Memorandum be revised in similar fashion. These are promising developments.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you again for beginning a much-needed process of Congressional oversight of the privilege waiver crisis. This is not an issue that Washington lobby groups have orchestrated, but it is one that likely will take Congressional attention to resolve.

Thank you. I look forward to your questions.

[The statement of Mr. Thornburgh follows:]

* INSERT **********

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Thornburgh.

And Mr. Donohue, in a sense of equity and fairness, since I permitted Mr. McCallum and Mr. Thornburgh to exceed the red light, I will not crack the hammer on you once that red light illuminates.

You are now recognized.

TESTIMONY OF THOMAS J. DONOHUE

Mr. DONOHUE. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Scott, members of the committee.

I am here today representing the Chamber and on behalf of a coalition to preserve the attorney-client privilege, which includes many of the major legal and business associations in our country, including the American Chemistry Council, the American Civil Liberties Union, the Association of Corporate Counsel, the Business Civil Liberties, Inc., the Business Roundtable, the Financial Services Roundtable, Frontiers of Freedom, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Defense Industrial Association, the Retail Industry Leaders Association, and the Washington Legal Foundation.

I should add that the coalition is working closely with the American Bar Association, which has separately submitted written testimony here today detailing its concerns about the erosion of the attorney-client privilege. ABA policy prevents the organization from being listed as a member of broader coalitions.

The privilege to consult with an attorney freely, candidly, and confidentially is a fundamental constitutional right that in our opinion is under attack. Recent policy changes at the Department of Justice and, very importantly, at the SEC have permitted and encouraged the Government to demand or expect companies to waive their attorney-client privilege or work product protections during an investigation.

A company is required to waive its privilege in order to be seen as cooperating with Federal investigators. A company that refuses to waive its privilege risks being labeled as uncooperative, which all but guarantees that it will not get a chance to come to a settlement or receive, if it needs to, leniency in sentencing or fines.

But it goes far beyond that, Mr. Chairman. The uncooperative label can severely damage a company's brand, its shareholder value, their relationship with suppliers and customers, and their very ability to survive.

The enforcement agencies argue that waiver of attorney-client privilege is necessary for improving compliance and conducting effective and thorough investigation. The opposite, in my opinion, is true. An uncertain and unprotected attorney-client privilege actually diminishes compliance with the law.

If company employees responsible for compliance with complicated statutes and regulations know that their conversations with attorneys are not protected, they will simply choose not to seek appropriate legal guidance. The result is that companies may fall out of compliance, often not intentionally, but because of a lack of communication and trust between a company's employees and its attorneys.

Similarly, during an investigation, if employees suspect that anything they say to their attorneys can be used against them, they won't say anything at all. That means that both the company and the Government will be unable to find out what went wrong, to punish wrongdoers, and to correct the company's compliance system.

And there is one other major consequence. Once the privilege is waived, third party private plaintiffs' lawyers can gain access to attorney-client conversations and use them to sue the company or other massive settlements. By the way, right now there are some arguments in the court about partial protection in waiving, and the question has been raised that perhaps the Government cannot even guarantee that.

How pervasive has this waiving of the attorney-client privilege become? Well, last November we presented findings to the U.S. Sentencing Commission showing that approximately a third of inside counsel respondents, and as many as 48 percent of outside counsel respondents, say they had personally experienced erosion of attorney-client privilege or work product protections.

After that presentation, the Sentencing Commission asked us for even more information about the frequency of waivers and their impact. So our coalition commissioned a second, more detailed survey and got an even greater response rate from the members of our coalition partners. We publicly released the results of this second survey just this morning. They have been provided to the committee, along with more detailed coalition written statements on the subject.

Here are a couple of highlights, and I am going to skip them because General Thornburgh mentioned them, but 75 percent of both inside and outside counsel agreed with the statement that a culture of waiver has evolved to the point the Government agencies believe it is responsible and appropriate to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or waiver protections. Of those who have been investigated, 55 percent of outside counsel say that that is the experience that they had.

Now, our coalition is aggressively seeking to reverse this erosion of confidence in the attorney-client provision and the conversations covered there. We are pleased that the U.S. Sentencing Committee has decided to revisit recently amended commentary to the guidelines that allow the waiver to be a cooperation factor in sentencing, and we have submitted more detailed materials to them.

We would encourage this committee to weigh in with its support of the attorney-client privilege to the Sentencing Commission as it reconsiders its guidelines. It is important to note that the Department of Justice and other regulatory agencies have created this erosion of the privilege without seeking input, oversight, or approval from the Congress or the judiciary. And the plan, Mr. Chairman, that is on the table now, would allow all 92 jurisdictions of the Department of Justice across the country to have their own plan, their own determination, of what is covered and what is protected. That is going to be a circus.

We seek your input and strongly urge you to exercise your oversight of the Department of Justice and the SEC to ensure the protection of attorney-client privilege. Now, let me be very clear as I close: Our efforts are not about trying to protect corrupt companies or businesspeople. Nobody wants corporate wrongdoers caught and punished more than I do and the legitimate and honest businesspeople that I represent. Rather, this is about protecting a well-established and vital constitutional right.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you and the members of the committee, and I look forward to your questions.

[The statement of Mr. Donohue follows:]

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Donohue.

Mr. Sullivan.

DBO

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM M. SULLIVAN, JR.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Thank you. Good afternoon, Chairman Coble, Ranking Member Scott, and members of the subcommittee. Thank you for your kind invitation to address you today concerning the Department of Justice policies and practices with regard to seeking attorney-client privilege and work product protection waivers from corporations, and whether the waiver of such privilege and protection should be relevant to assessing the corporations' cooperation efforts within the meaning of the organizational guidelines.

I am currently a partner at the law firm of Winston & Strawn, where I specialize in white collar criminal defense and corporate internal investigations. For 10 years, from 1991 to 2001, I served as an assistant U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia. In these capacities, I have been involved in virtually all aspects of white collar investigations and corporate defense.

I have overseen both criminal investigations as a prosecutor and internal corporate investigations as a defense attorney. And I have represented both corporations and individuals in internal investigations and before Federal law enforcement authorities and regulators as well as in class action, derivative, and ERISA litigation.

My perspective on corporate cooperation and the waiver of attorney-client and attorney work product privileges has therefore been forged not only by my experiences on both sides of the criminal justice system, but by my participation in the civil arena as well. This afternoon, I am eager to give you a view from the arena.

The real issue is not the waiver but what is being waived and how it was assembled. For business organizations today, the traditional protections afforded by the attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine are under siege. The privilege reflects the public priority of facilitating the observance of law through candor with counsel.

Prosecutors and regulators now routinely demand that in return for the mere prospect of leniency, corporations engage in intensive internal investigations of alleged wrongdoing and submit detailed written reports documenting both the depth and breadth of their inquiry as well as the basis for their conclusions. Attorney impressions, opinions, and evaluations are necessarily included.

When pressed on this practice, many prosecutors and regulators will publicly insist that they are only seeking a roadmap--the identity of the individuals involved, the crucial acts, and the supporting documentation. However, this has not been my personal experience.

Just last week I was asked by a Government regulator in our very first meeting to broadly waive attorney-client private and work product protection and to provide copies of interview notes, even before I had completed my client's internal investigation myself, and accordingly, even before I had determined as corporate counsel that cooperation would be in my client's best interest.

Incredibly, I was further asked whether or not I was appearing as an advocate for my client the corporation or whether I was an independent third party. Presumably, the regulators had hoped that I would undertake their investigation for them, despite the fact that I would be paid by my client to do so.

Most importantly, however, such roadmap requests fail to relieve the valid concerns of corporations related to privilege and work product waivers. A less than carefully drawn roadmap risks a broad subject matter waiver of attorney-client privilege and attorney work product protection under a current authority applicable in just about every jurisdiction.

The waiver of attorney-client communications arriving in connection with a factual roadmap subsequently disclosed to law enforcement extends beyond the disclosure itself and encompasses all communications on that subject matter. The consequences of this result can be extreme, in that even a rudimentary roadmap is the product of information obtained through thousands of hours of legal work spent conducting interviews, parsing statements from hundreds of pages of interview notes, and analyzing thousands and perhaps millions of pages of both privileged and nonprivileged corporate documents.

Furthermore, the waiver would be applicable not only to the law enforcement officials receiving the information, but would also embrace future third parties, including other Government agencies and opportunistic plaintiffs' counsel seeking fodder for class action and derivative strike suits.

In addressing the practice of conditioning leniency for disclosure of otherwise privileged reports, I believe that a balance must be struck between the legitimate interests of law enforcement in pursuing and punishing the legal conduct, the benefits to be retained by corporations which assist this process and determine to take remedial action, and the rights of individual employees.

It is imperative that we do not sacrifice accuracy and fundamental fairness for expedience and convenience now routinely requested by the Government. An equilibrium much achieved between the aforementioned competing concerns.

The issues being addressed today in this committee meeting are not simply part of an academic debate. Across the country, there are dozens of corporations scrutinized in internal investigations at any one time, with real consequences for real people. These investigations directly impact the lives of thousands of workers and millions of shareholders.

In conditioning leniency upon the disclosure of otherwise privileged information, we need to accommodate the competing interests of effective law enforcement, the benefits down to deserving corporations, the corporation's own interests and its ability to observe law through consultation with counsel, and the fundamental rights of individual employees.

Reaching a consensus on the information sought by the Government, limiting that information to non-opinion factual work product or perhaps the adoption of a selective waiver for cooperating corporations, and lucid, comprehensive standards to guide internal investigations, are each important first steps.

Thank you, and I look forward to your questions.

[The statement of Mr. Sullivan follows:]

* SUBCOMMITTEE INSERT **********

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Sullivan.

Mr. McCallum, I think--by the way, we apply the 5-minute rule to ourselves as well, so we will try to move along here.

Mr. McCallum, I think Mr. Donohue may have touched on this. And where I am coming from is: Does the policy require uniform review? That is to say, a United States Attorney in the Middle District of North Carolina, would it be likely or unlikely that he or she would be operating under a policy that would be identical to the Eastern District of Virginia?

Your mike is not on, Mr. McCallum.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Mr. Chairman, in response to that question, the memorandum that I issued does allow for the different United States Attorneys to institute a review policy in accordance with the peculiar circumstance of their particular district.

For instance, the Southern District of New York may be very different than the District of Montana in terms of the number of sophisticated corporate cases that involve allegations of corporate fraud, and therefore the number of people that are in the Southern District of New York, the number of Assistant United States Attorneys that are available for the review process, may be very different than the number of attorneys that are in a different district.

So it is not identical, but it affords the type of prosecutorial discretion in the United States Attorney to determine what it will be, and that is coordinated through the Executive Office of United States Attorneys in the Department of Justice as well.

Mr. COBLE. I thank you, sir. Now, you indicated, Mr. McCallum, that in some instances, the corporate defendant may well be the one to initiate the waiver. Do you have any figures as to, comparatively speaking, Government initiated or defendant initiated?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Mr. Chairman, we do not have statistical figures like that. And most of the surveys, including, we believe, the survey that we have not yet seen that the Chamber of Commerce just issued this morning, are based more on perception and anecdotal evidence than they are on very, very specific identification of particular cases.

We have been involved in a dialogue with various business representatives, including the task force of the American Bar Association that is dealing with this issue, with its chairman. And we invited him and Jamie Conrad, who is here today, to come out and talk with the United States Attorneys last year at their annual conference to make sure that the United States Attorneys were aware of exactly the concerns and the issues that the business community was seeing in this.

And we were told at that time that a very detailed study of particular cases would be prepared and would be provided to us. And just last week, Mr. Ide, the ABA chairman, indicated to me that that was forthcoming. That will allow us to dig down into the specifics because each case is really unique, Mr. Chairman. And it is that sort of detailed analysis that will be necessary to determine or refute the ''routineness'' with which these waivers are requested. We do not believe that they are ''routinely'' requested.

Mr. COBLE. I thank you, Mr. McCallum.

Mr. Thornburgh, during your many years of public service, were you ever aware of any criminal case in which the Justice Department sought or required an attorney-client privilege waiver from a cooperating corporation, A; and if so, what was and is your position on that issue?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I am not aware of any such request, Mr. Chairman, although I can't absolutely verify that such a request was not made at any time during the 25 years that I have been affiliated one way or another with the Department of Justice. It is a development of the last decade or so.

I would just like to add a footnote to Mr. McCallum's response. It seems to me that the Department is giving up too much by permitting each United States Attorney to frame his own set of policies on this kind of question. Uniformity and internal Department of Justice review has been adopted in any number of areas that are sensitive, such as issuing a subpoena to an attorney or to a reporter, or using undercover sting operations. Those are not within the discretion of the U.S. Attorney. And when we are dealing with such a sensitive and venerable privilege as the attorney-client privilege, it seems to me that ought to be the kind of rule that is applied.

Secondly, I think that there is a controversy, at least, with regard to statistics about whether or not frequent use is made of this waiver request. And the easiest way to do that is to promulgate a review process within the Department so that you have readily available at your fingertips the absolute number of times it has been carried out.

If, as the Department claims, these are limited and infrequent, it would not impose any undue burden. If, on the other hand, they are as the perceptions indicate from this report, it would provide a solid base for evaluating whether or not this process is going forward in the right manner.

Mr. COBLE. I thank you, Mr. Thornburgh. I see my time has expired. Gentlemen, we probably will have a second round of questioning because I have questions for Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Donohue. This is significant enough, I think, to do that.

The gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SCOTT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, we have a public policy on the attorney-client privilege which we are trying to protect. There are other kind of public policies that can't be--where you can't use certain things as evidence when you are trying to investigate and fix a problem. You can't--the fact that you fixed a product subsequently can't be used to show negligence of the former product because that would obviously discourage fixing. Evidence that you tried to settle a case can't be used as an admission because that would discourage settlements.

Is there a public policy that we want to protect in trying to protect, to the extent possible, the attorney-client privilege, Mr. McCallum?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Ranking Member Scott, there is unquestionably recognized within the Department of Justice the societal benefits that attend to the attorney-client privilege and work product privilege and various other privileges. And it is certainly something that the United States Attorneys are--and the other Federal prosecutors are mindful of.

And I think that one of the things that you are alluding to is something that all three of my distinguished panelists have touched on, and that is the providing of information to the Government, whether to a regulator or to a prosecutor, and the consequences of that disclosure in the civil litigation area.

Now, that, I mentioned previously, is an area that the Federal Rules Advisory Committee on Evidence is looking at. It is also an area that there have been bills introduced and the Congress to address that issue. So I think that there is certainly recognition.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I think Mr. Donohue kind of alluded to civil litigation because if somebody blurts something out in a criminal investigation totally unrelated to what may be said affecting civil litigation, you could open yourself up to all kinds of problems including massive punitive damages if all that information got out. Is that right?

Mr. MCCALLUM. There is a consequence of a waiver of attorney-client privilege, and one context being a waiver in other contexts. That is correct, Mr. Scott.

Mr. SCOTT. Okay. Well, have you ever asked for waivers in individual cases?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I am sure that, like former Attorney General Thornburgh, I can't tell you that that has never happened. I am--it has never happened in any case that I am involved in. And I think there is one issue that needs to be focused on here, is that there is an issue of attorney-client waivers, privilege waivers, by the corporation. That is, the lawyers who represent the corporation. In my opening statement, I made the point that they do not represent the management. They do not represent employees.

And I am sure that Mr. Sullivan, every time he does an internal investigation and interviews a witness, he explains to them exactly who he represents, i.e., that it is the corporation, and that that individual who is being interviewed is not his client and there is no attorney-client privilege between him and that individual.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I mean, in an individual criminal case where an individual is the defendant, have you ever asked for a waiver of attorney-client privilege?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I never have, Mr. Scott. But my experience over my 35-year career has been predominately in the civil litigation area. So I would not be someone who would be able to respond to that effectively.

Mr. SCOTT. Have you ever had cases that the defendant, the corporate defendant, got leniency for cooperation when they had not waived attorney-client privilege?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I cannot personally testify to that. I can tell you that within the Department, I am informed by those that have extensive experience in the criminal area that that is indeed the case, that cooperation is but one factor in the Thompson Memorandum in determining whether to indict someone. And it is a factor, of course, in the Sentencing Commission current matters.

Mr. SCOTT. Can you get the cooperation benefit without waiving attorney-client privilege?

Mr. MCCALLUM. There are--there are any number of instances, I am informed, in which that is indeed the case, yes, and that the circumstances of a corporation providing information may not require the waiver of attorney-client privileged information of work product information.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me ask one further question. Mr. Sullivan, you represent corporations, many of whom have multi-jurisdictional activities. Would there be a problem in having 92 different processes in terms of what the attorney-client privilege may be?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Ranking Member Scott, yes. I think that would be a very difficult road to navigate. It is difficult enough working with prosecutors and regulators who are insistent that you do their work for them. And in fact, if I am in a situation where I am evaluating a cooperative mode for purposes of obtaining favorable treatment by the Government in exchange for a new compliance program, ferreting out wrongdoing--which would be my obligation in any event--to the extent that I would have to, in a multi-district context, deal with a variety of competing considerations along the same lines would make my job much more difficult and would also cause intractable problems on the part of the corporation in terms of negotiating a resolution.

Let me also add that I know the context here is cooperation, but I don't think the presumption of innocence should be forgotten. And when I addressed the committee a few minutes ago and mentioned that at the very first meeting I was asked to waive the privilege, I also mentioned that I had not even conducted an internal investigation and therefore had not made up my mind as to whether I have defensible conduct or not. So I think that also illuminates the mindset that corporate counsel are dealing with today.

Mr. COBLE. I thank the gentleman.

We have been joined by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Chabot.

And in order of appearance, the Chair recognizes the distinguished gentleman from Florida, Mr. Feeney.

Mr. FEENEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I am grateful for the testimony from all our distinguished panel.

You know, I had an observation I thought perhaps you could talk a little bit about because I think you have gone into some details about the importance historically of the attorney-client privilege.

By the way, I would point out that most of us who, you know, practiced law at one point think of this more in the context of criminal--of violent crime as opposed to corporate crime, exactly for the reasons that former Attorney General Thornburgh laid out. This really hasn't been used until the last 8 or 10 years, this waiver requirement.

But the average violent criminal doesn't have deep pockets. And other than the fact that if he fails to comply and waive privilege, for example, there is very little incentive. He is not subject to fines because he has got the empty pocket defense. He is not worried about civil litigants. But for a lot of the reasons that Mr. Donohue laid out, the pressure on corporate clients and business clients is immense to find favor as they cooperate, and there is an enormous pressure on them.

I do understand the necessity at times to try in a corporate context, especially with respect to fraud, to find out what everybody knew, and that would include corporate counsel. What I am worried about, and I guess I want to put it in this respect--Mr. Sullivan might be the best person to answer this--we live in a very new climate on Wall Street. I mean, investors appropriately expect a lot more transparency. We had things like Enron and WorldCom.

But in some ways, we may have overreacted. Post-Sarbanes-Oxley, directors have some real problems. Number one, we don't have a standard set of accounting principles, so that a major international corporate firm may be responsible, and the directors individually liable, to know where every box of pencils or paper clips are. And we don't have standards to protect people based on de minimis standards.

When directors or executives with corporations go and they hire an independent auditor nowadays, they are not allowed to seek the guidance of their auditor. They can't get help from one of the top four accounting firms that they have to pay. That firm is not allowed to tell them how to comply with Sarbanes-Oxley.

Now we are in a position where if we are going to have what amounts to blanket waivers or, in some jurisdictions, anyway, what amounts to blanket waivers, where corporate executives and corporate directors, who are going to be held personally responsible even if they didn't necessarily know about mis-actions that somebody else in the corporation took over, can't be candid with their lawyer and cannot count on candid advice back.

That type of chilling effect makes it almost impossible for anybody with any sense to agree to be a member of the board of directors today, and I thought maybe Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Donohue could talk about this in the totality of the circumstances today in corporate law. I mean, this is just one more burden that makes it almost impossible to try to do your job in an honest way as a member of a board or an executive at a major corporation.

Mr. Sullivan, go ahead.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Thank you, Mr. Feeney. Well, in fact, you are absolutely correct. Corporations have noticed a dearth of willing applicants in terms of individuals who are willing to serve on boards. What is attempted these days is to maintain a level of independence, both with outside counsel as well as special audit committees, special litigation committees, and as you mentioned, even accountants.

But it also goes right back to what Mr. McCallum said, and he is absolutely correct. I am well aware of the Upjohn warnings, and when I am pursuing an internal investigation, I am obligated and I do advise the individuals whom I am interviewing that I do not represent them.

But in fact, if we move forward and they are led to believe that not only do I not represent them but I am also going to turn over everything they say to the Government at a moment's notice, upon caprice or whim because I am interested in maintaining the best possible position of the corporation, we are in a situation where, as Mr. Donohue mentioned, I won't get any information at all.

The corporate entity is an artificial entity, true. It has legal responsibilities, true. But it also is run and managed by people. The acts of the employees are imputed to the corporation. So you must deal with the people because they are the ones who bind the corporation.

And for my--from my perspective as well as the perspective of independent directors or board members or auditors or management, we need to be able to access facts. We need to be able to do it freely, without any concerns about where those facts may ultimately go. And we need to be able to manage the information we have so that we can evaluate properly how to respond to Government inquiries.

As I mentioned before, all too often the first mode that a corporation will pursue is cooperation. They will find or seek to find responsible employees and throw them under the bus. That is not necessarily the best policy. In a free-flowing exchange of information environment where the lawyer can carefully evaluate the information he has, he can make the best decision for that corporation in how to deal with regulators and ultimately save everybody a lot of money, shareholders and individual investors.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Donohue?

Mr. DONOHUE. I serve on three public company boards of directors. And I will say in response to your inquiry that, first of all, it is getting harder and harder to attract competent directors, not only because of the fear of liability, which is getting greater, but because of the extraordinary amount of time and process that has to be followed following the Sarbanes-Oxley rules and their implementation.

What directors most worry about, other than running the company, leading the company and having good management that operates in an honorable way, are two things, and that is dealing with regulators of every type and shape and dealing with the Justice Department. And by the way, when you get people like Mr. McCallum here, if he were to come out and deal with the issues that individual companies have to deal with, we would do fine.

But they have the greatest collection of young, soon-to-make-it, want-to-be-famous kinds of lawyers all around the country who, by the way, don't have the same amount of judgment and experience, and many have little or no idea what corporations do and how they are supposed to work.

So when 92 different groups--by the way, and when there is an approval, it will be approval by the U.S. Attorney for one of his underlings--they are going to have 92 different approaches to do this, it is going to get a little more complicated for most of the companies on whose boards I serve.

And I am not--we are not talking about huge criminal issues; there are always questions with the SEC and others. And it gets very, very complicated when everybody has got a different rule. Everybody has got a different way of approaching it. And standing behind them like vultures on a fence are the class action and the mass action lawyers that are sucking the vitality out of American industry. And they are doing it, maybe unintended, but they are doing it with the help of our Government, who is putting us in that kind of a position that it shouldn't happen.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time has expired.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Delahunt, recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DELAHUNT. I would think, Mr. Sullivan, that you must find yourself in a position where not only do you have to inform the employee that you are not his lawyer, but there is going to be a likelihood that what he tells you will become--you will at some point in time be compelled to reveal to the Government exactly what he says.

Have you run into that situation?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Yes, Mr. Delahunt. As part of the Upjohn warnings, I am required to advise the employee that I represent the company, that the privilege resides with the company, and that the privilege can be waived by the company at any time--

Mr. DELAHUNT. And that--

Mr. SULLIVAN. --and in any manner.

Mr. DELAHUNT. --in a significant number of cases, the privilege is waived.

You know what I can't understand, Mr. McCallum, is what happened in the past 10 years? You know, for 20 years of my own professional life, I was a--I was a prosecutor. Did a number of sophisticated white collar crime investigations.

And, I mean, there are grand juries. There is the use of informants. You know, we knew how to squeeze people without sacrificing or eroding the attorney-client privilege.

You know, I just have this very uneasy feeling that it is the easy way to do it, you know. There is a certain level of, you know, why should I--why should I have to really exercise myself to secure the truth?

You know, from what I understand, there has been no review in terms of the frequency of the waiver. There is no data. There is nothing empirical. But, you know, Mr. Thornburgh and Mr. Sullivan, you know, I am sure they have had extensive practices. At least anecdotally, you know, they are here. They are concerned.

Is there something that I am missing that the traditional law enforcement investigatory techniques were insufficient?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Mr. Delahunt--

Mr. DELAHUNT. I got to tell you something. I am a little annoyed with the Sentencing Commission, too, making this a factor. You know, where did that come from? Go ahead.

Mr. MCCALLUM. I believe it came from the defense bar, who wanted to pin down for certain that if there was a waiver--to answer the second question first--

Mr. DELAHUNT. Sure. Thanks.

Mr. MCCALLUM. --if there was a waiver, that it would necessarily be deemed cooperation for purposes of a downward departure. But let me--

Mr. DELAHUNT. Well, I would just dwell on that for a minute because we will get a second round.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Okay.

Mr. DELAHUNT. I would want to--I would want to hear that coming from, you know, some criminal defense lawyer, saying that that is the import of it. Because that tells me that if they are looking for that kind of certainty, that this is being used frequently. This is--this is becoming the rule rather than the exception. But go ahead and take a shot at my--

Mr. MCCALLUM. Let me respond to the first question, Mr. Delahunt, and that is what has happened recently over the years? I think we only have to look back to the 1997 through 2006 era to see a spate of very complicated, very complex, very arcane, very difficult to determine corporate frauds of immense proportions in terms of the dollar amounts involved which also--

Mr. DELAHUNT. With all due respect, Mr. McCallum, I got to tell you something. That just doesn't--that doesn't hold water. You know, I am sure immense complex fraud has been being perpetrated, you know, since the days of the robber barons. If we don't have the resources in the Department of Justice to conduct the necessary investigations to deal with it, then let's assess it on a resource basis. Let's not do it the easy way that erodes, I believe, a fundamental principal of American jurisprudence.

I mean, if that is what you are telling me, I won't accept it because of my own experience. You know, fraud is nothing new. Uncovering it maybe is, but, I mean, there is--you have--you know, you can use immunity. There are informants. There are grand juries. There are all kinds of ways to do it.

And I am sure Mr. Thornburgh, being a former Attorney General and a former, I think, Attorney General in a State, I am sure he supervised or conducted a series of heavy investigations that are as complex as anything that, you know, occurred from 1997 to date, and did it in a way that didn't erode significant legal principles that are embedded in our jurisprudence.

I will be back, and you can think about the question.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Thank you.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time has expired.

The distinguished gentleman from California.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, it is always fun being with my friend from Massachusetts. I was trying to figure out what he said when he said ''partay,'' and then I thought he was talking about getting a drink and going out someplace.

[Laughter.]

Mr. DELAHUNT. I can't understand what you are talking about.

Mr. LUNGREN. But I understand. You weren't talking about a party, you were talking about a part A. I got that. Okay.

And Mr. Sullivan, I have been informed by counsel here that the two of you used to work together, so that you used to be one of those fellows that resembled the remarks of Mr. Donohue.

[Laughter.]

Mr. LUNGREN. But now you have made it.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Volkoff was a fine mentor.

Mr. LUNGREN. And I wondered if you had to deal with 92 different jurisdictions. It would certainly improve your billables.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SULLIVAN. I try to get involved in--

Mr. LUNGREN. But those Italian suits could be kept up, as it was.

Just to put it on the record, I have submitted a letter last August to the Sentencing Commission regarding my concerns about the Sentencing Commission's commentary with respect to the rule. It looks to me like that amendment authorizes and encourages the Government to require entities to waive the attorney-client privilege and work product protections as a condition of showing cooperation. And that is the huge concern I have here.

Let me ask you this, Mr. McCallum: Should we in the Congress believe that any time the administration refuses to waive executive privilege, that the administration is not cooperating with the Congress?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Absolutely not, Mr. Lungren. I would--I would hesitate to make that argument. There are benefits, and I think that in my opening statement I described that there are definitely benefits, societal benefits, from attorney-client privilege.

Mr. LUNGREN. But, see, that--I understand. See, that is my problem. If we in the Congress were to every time the President says that there is a reason to protect executive privilege, not only for his administration but for future administrations, that every time he did that he was violating the sense of cooperation that should prevail between two equal branches of government, I think we would be wrong.

And I see the Justice Department taking a position that if a corporate defendant or potential defendant refuses to waive that privilege, that is a priori evidence of the fact that they are not cooperating. And that is the problem I really have here.

See, the President makes the arguments--and I think that you should--and the Department makes the arguments that there is a reason for those privileges that at the executive branch has. And the reason is part institutional, but part to have that ability to speak within yourselves, that is, that institution of the administration, which is more than the President but is personified by the President. He can talk to his advisors without believing that we are going to hear everything he says.

And here you have a situation where you want a corporation to follow the law, I presume. And you would want the corporation to listen to good counsel, I would think. And here we have got a rule that seems to me to work in the opposite direction.

And I think that that weighs heavy on me and other members here on this panel. And so I would ask, don't you see the creeping intrusion here? I mean, first you have the first memorandum. Now we have the second memorandum, which is a little tighter and a little tougher. And then, following that, you have the Sentencing Commission saying, well, that is a bad idea. As a matter of fact, we are going to have that as evidence of cooperation, and the lack of it as evidence of lack of cooperation.

What is a corporate counsel to do under those circumstances?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Well, there are a series of questions there, Mr. Lungren. Number one, with respect to the Sentencing Commission, the Department's position has been we would be comfortable with the Sentencing Commission going back to where it was before that amendment.

Mr. LUNGREN. Well, is that your position? Is that the administration's position?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I believe that that is the Department of Justice's review--

Mr. LUNGREN. That is what I mean.

Mr. MCCALLUM. --underway at this particular time. I do not know whether that has been absolutely finalized. But my review of that is that there would not necessarily be an objection to going back to the way it was before, where it was not addressed.

Number two, let me talk about the issue of cooperation. Attorney-client privilege waivers are only one factor with respect to cooperation. There are many other ways for a corporation under the Thompson Memorandum to indicate and to provide a degree of cooperation that will impact both the decisions on the charging of the corporation and on the determination of recommendations to be made to any sentencing commission about--or to any sentencing body about a downward deviation. So I don't--I don't think that it is accurate to assert that privilege waivers are the sine qua non or the absolute requirement in order to achieve a status of cooperation with prosecutors.

With respect to the diversity of jurisdictions, the 92 different districts, as I indicated previously, this is not a situation in which one size fits all. And what the McCallum Memorandum really did was to recognize a best practices that was, in my view, attendant to United States Attorneys across the United States in which privilege waiver requests, formal ones from the Government, as opposed to privilege waiver offers voluntarily from corporations, would go through some sort of supervisory review that would preserve for the peculiar circumstances of that particular district and the United States Attorney there a degree of flexibility.

But all of that would be done in coordination through the Executive Office of United States Attorneys. So I don't think it is an accurate picture to paint, 92 different definitions of what is attorney-client privileged and what is not attorney-client privileged. It is a second set of eyes to reassure that there is a deliberate and considered process before attorney-client privilege waivers are requested by the Department of Justice.

Mr. LUNGREN. Thank you.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time is expired.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Chabot.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Donohue, if I could begin with you. Can you give the subcommittee any examples from your members of instances where a request for a Department of Justice--for an attorney-client waiver resulted in unnecessary consequences for the corporation, perhaps a third party suit, for example, and arguably the information could have been gathered without a waiver?

Mr. DONOHUE. Well, sir, you have just put your finger on why this is a very difficult matter to challenge, either here in the Congress or in the courts, because most companies that have been painted into this box are not going to come forward and give you an example. I know many examples. I would suggest it is probably in our mutual best interests not to lay out the names of a bunch of companies.

I could tell you a couple of interesting points. In one matter that I am aware of, the prosecutor in a jurisdiction gave a public speech and said, in our jurisdiction, anybody failing to waive the privilege will be considered guilty. I passed that material on to the Justice Department; I don't know how it was used.

But if you were to go--and by the way, it is very, very important to understand that the SEC and the Justice Department have hundreds and thousands of investigations going on. And the great amount of these have nothing to do with fraud. They have arguments about proper accounting and all kinds of other issues.

Where there is fraud, there should be a vigorous investigation. But, you know, I was trying to think of a good example that I might use. You know, the Inquisition supposedly had the blessing of the Church, but their means weren't very appropriate. And when Mr. McCallum began today, he laid out a rationale of why they should be able to do these things because of the assignment they were given to respond to Sarbanes-Oxley.

My understanding is that the privilege is a constitutional protection, and that the end does not justify the means, and that the serious nature of this--and I think the point made about resources did not--should not put the companies in the position of conducting investigations, which I am aware of many, to supplement the work and actually do to the work of the prosecutors.

And I ended my statement by saying if people maliciously, directly, and intentionally go out and violate the law and they are in the American business community, lock them up. But you try and go out, as Mr. Sullivan indicated, and deal with these prosecutors--and you have got two sets of them; you got the SEC and you got the Justice Department, and they are playing off each other, and they are sitting in the same rooms, you know, when you have a civil issue and you have a criminal issue. And I would just say, you know, if you and I want to walk down a hall one day, I will give you four or five examples. But with the Chairman's permission and protection, I am not going to do that here.

[Laughter.]

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you very much.

Mr. Sullivan, if I could ask you the next question. What alternative techniques are available to prosecutors to obtain the needed information from a corporation without requiring a waiver of the attorney-client privilege?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Delahunt alluded to many, drawing upon his hears as a prosecutor. There are all types of investigative techniques. There is cooperation undertaken by individuals within the corporation. There is the grand jury process, with subpoenas. There are wires.

What also is available, and which I suggested, for purposes of a corporation who is--which is interested in cooperating is the factual recitation, which is actually quite common: a factual review of what the outside counsel's investigation has yielded, with a view toward working in concert with the Government, ferreting out the criminal activity as it is perhaps determined to be a rogue element or an independent group working without knowledge of management. We see that in export control cases, for example, where shipments are made abroad by individuals who have an incentive for sales commissions without the knowledge of management or at least without management understanding that ineffective internal controls were in place.

All of this suggests that the corporate entity itself and outside counsel, certainly responsible management, as Mr. Donohue has mentioned, has an interest in abiding by the law. And to the extent that it becomes aware of problems with the law, either through its own inquiry or through an external source, a subpoena or whatnot, outside counsel working with in-house counsel wants to ferret that out and find it out.

And we will assist the Government to the extent that it is in our best interests to provide them with the roadmap, with the factual outline, who you should talk to, what this document means. But we shouldn't have to and we don't want to provide them with our mental impressions, our specific interview notes, our opinion work product, and our sensitive discussions with employees because we want to preserve the ability to talk to them again about another problem so that we can continue to observe the law.

And the factual recitation is not something that is ultimately going to be a problem. Factual recitations are found in indictments every day in every public context. If you want to learn what happened in a particular case, what went wrong, read the Government's indictment. And we will help you with that factual outline to preserve our ability to interact with you and to get credit for cooperation. But you should be encouraged, Mr. Prosecutor, and you should insist on doing your own legal analysis.

Mr. CHABOT. Thank you.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time is expired. I thank the gentleman.

Gentlemen, as I said earlier, I think this issue warrants a second round, so we will commence that now.

Mr. Donohue, I may be repetitive, but I want to be sure this is in the record. In your testimony, you mentioned that erosion of the attorney-client privilege will frustrate corporate efforts to comply with regulations and statutes. Elaborate a little bit more in detail about that.

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Chairman, what happens in a company is when issues of significance--it happens with me every day--come up that we are dealing with some Federal regulation, some political regulation, whatever it is, the first thing we do is call the general counsel. When we are sued, as people are on a regular basis, the first thing we do is call the general counsel. And these are all civil matters.

But I want to have a feeling that when I sit down and talk to Steve Bokat, who is the general counsel of the United States Chamber of Commerce, that what I am talking about is going to stay there. And if I had a feeling that in matters where there may be differences with the Government, there may be differences with regulars, if I talk to him, if anybody wanted to bring an action against us, he is going to be up sitting--talking about what we discussed, I am not too sure I am going to talk to him. Nor am I going to go and get my regulatory counsel, nor am I going to go down and get my outside counsel.

At least--you know, the term ''counsel'' is used up here a great deal. And if you look to your right, you have your counsel, and you sure want to make sure that what you are talking to him about is not blabbed all over this place.

Mr. COBLE. Yes. Well, that is what I thought you--

Mr. DONOHUE. And I think we have a constitutional right to do that.

Mr. COBLE. Thank you, Mr. Donohue.

Mr. Sullivan, in your testimony, you noted that you represented a client before a regulator who requested a waiver prior to your client's declining to cooperate or deciding to cooperate.

What impact would such a waiver have on your ability to represent a client corporation, given--under those facts?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Of course, I declined that request immediately. And in fact, as Mr. Donohue so perceptively referenced only upon hearing my anecdote, there were more than one law enforcement agency representative in there. There was the tag team, as he referenced a few moments ago.

As I said before, this was a very early meeting, a meet and greet, if you will, where I was attempting to outline to them what my preliminary view of the evidence I had gathered after only a couple weeks would suggest as a function of how to address their concerns.

I had not made up my mind as to what I would do in terms of seeking cooperation or defending. As I said before, we should never forget about the presumption of innocence as a corporate representative, as a corporate lawyer, and we should always ferret out the facts and then have a good understanding of the law on those facts to understand whether or not there was a crime committed and whether or not there was a credible defense.

But to go directly to answer your question, if I had undertaken to waive the privilege, how would I walk into that company's office the following day? We had not determined that a crime had been committed or that there were regulatory problems. I needed to find out what went on, and in the best way possible, so that I could represent that client in an informed way.

Who would speak to me, Mr. Chairman? What type of evidence would I be able to gain? I would be nothing more than an arm of the Government. I would in fact have been deputized. My role would be completely eliminated. It makes no sense, particularly when, if I found there was wrongdoing and I needed to work with the Government, I would be most pleased to do so by rendering factual, non-opinion work product.

Mr. COBLE. I thank the gentleman.

The gentleman from Virginia. The distinguished gentleman from Virginia.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sullivan, why would a corporation do an in-depth investigation of suspected employee misconduct if the report of that investigation has to be turned over to the prosecutors?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, frequently reports are turned over to prosecutors. In fact, we see public reports very frequently. We just saw a very public Fannie Mae report. Shell has got a report. Baker Botts has got Freddie Mac's report on its website.

The difference is, again, reports outlining factual undertakings and understandings as opposed to attorney work product and attorney-client communications. And--

Mr. SCOTT. Well, let me ask it another way. If you are writing such a report, would you be writing it to be read by the president of the corporation or by the prosecutor? I mean, you know, you would say things differently depending on who the audience is.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Sure. And it depends who I represent and what my charge might be. The individuals who, for example, are writing the Fannie Mae report may have been reporting to an independent board, an independent accounting board or an independent board of directors, coming in after the fact to outline what facts happened. I think they would be very cautious in outlining any opinion work product in that report.

And to be fair to the Justice Department, I have not seen requests for waiver of attorney-client communications. It is all work product. And I am not saying that in any way to suggest that it is any less nefarious. It is the opinion attorney work product, which is perhaps the most dangerous.

But to the extent that I would undertake to write a report, a report for the general counsel or for the board of directors, I would insist that it be a privileged document, that it would include my mental impressions and opinions, thereby covering it as work product, perhaps made in anticipation of litigation as well. It would certainly be an attorney-client communication because I would be proffering it to the general counsel. But I would never want that to go elsewhere. A parsed, very narrowly drawn factual recitation I might be persuaded to part company with.

One thing I would like to also mention, Ranking Member Scott. You earlier in the hearing talked about public policies regarding inadmissible information and material. I think that was a very important point. I would like to bring out that I have represented Federal prosecutors in internal DOJ investigations, OPR investigations, Office of Professional Responsibility.

There is no compelled waiver of the Fifth Amendment. There is no compelled self-incrimination under pain of losing your job in the Justice Department. There is a Supreme Court case on that, Garrity. Nevertheless, I am literally asked by Justice Department officials to bring my employees in and to tell them they either tell me everything or they walk.

And I have no problem doing that because there is no specific type of due process in a corporation. But the next step is, and by the way, once you get something from that employee and if it is an incriminatory Fifth Amendment waiver, I did it, I want it, Mr. Sullivan. And that is where I draw the line.

They don't extract from their own employees. Why should they ask that kind of duress of mine, or of my clients?

Mr. SCOTT. Thank you. Exactly who can waive the privilege?

Mr. SULLIVAN. The corporation, to the extent that the corporation has the privilege when we are dealing with corporations and employees.

Mr. SCOTT. Who? Who? The CEO?

Mr. SULLIVAN. We would have to get that consent of representative management, whoever is running the program, the board, in consultation with counsel.

Mr. SCOTT. Can the CEO waive the privilege?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Not as an individual. He has got to only do it on behalf of the corporation as a function of his role as a corporate representative.

Mr. SCOTT. Is that right, Mr. Donohue?

Mr. DONOHUE. I believe procedurally the CEO could move, with probably advice of his lawyer, to waive the privilege. But in these kinds of instances, this would be so sensitive that it would already be up to the board, and the board would be informed of that change in circumstance.

Mr. SULLIVAN. and that is what I meant by--

Mr. DONOHUE. That probably wouldn't have been done four or five years ago, but it would sure be done today.

Mr. SCOTT. Are you aware of--the Department indicated that they don't--you can get full cooperation without a waiver. Are you aware of cases where full cooperation credit on sentencing was given without a waiver of attorney-client privilege?

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Scott, I am sure it has. I cannot give you a definitive case. The more difficult the case, the more visible the Justice Department and the SEC has been in announcing the case and how they are going to be successful and all these terrible things that have happened before they have had their full investigation, the more aggressive the SEC and Justice Department lawyers are going to be to try and make sure that they are successful.

And when they are having problems in finding what they thought they were going to find, then they want the company to investigate it for them, and they want people to break the privilege. We are not trying to protect criminals. We are trying to protect a constitutional protection that is given to individuals and corporate individuals, and we believe it is being eroded.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, could I ask one other question?

In terms of corporate organization, which attorney--do all attorneys in the corporation have the privilege, or is it just corporate counsel we are talking about? And let me follow up on that by saying, I mean, there is some--if you are trying to discuss certain activities, trying to come up with a process that may be kind of borderline legal, would you help yourself by having the person in that position you are talking to be an attorney where you wouldn't get that privilege if it was not an attorney? And do you find people hiring lawyers in kind of non-lawyer positions to try to get a privilege?

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Scott, I am going to respond and then ask Mr. Sullivan if he would make sure I am correct. But I am not sending him a fee.

[Laughter.]

Mr. DONOHUE. You know, generally, when one is dealing with broad corporate matters, the general counsel of the corporation, who is an officer of the court by his own professional standing, would be the person that would have this role with the CEO or other executives.

There are, however, issues, for example, on SEC questions or environmental questions or other matters where there are senior lawyers within the institution, probably but not necessarily working for the general counsel, who on those matters would be seen as the more senior person with whom discussions and therefore protected discussions could have been held.

Mr. Sullivan, you have had a minute to think about that.

Mr. SULLIVAN. You are absolutely right. My experience has been working with the general counsel and other lawyers in the company who hold particular expertise in various areas as questions may arise. But no privilege determinations are made without the assent and consent of the board or a special committee who is operating in a joint way--a special committee on accounting, a special litigation committee--so that there is usually a board approval at the highest levels for such--

Mr. SCOTT. Board approval to determine who has a privilege and who doesn't?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Well, board approval relating to waiver of the privilege.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I mean, if you have in a certain department--for example, sometimes a person may be hired as a lawyer; sometimes they may have expertise and are not a lawyer. Would the lawyer have--would there be a privilege when the person happens to be a lawyer and a privilege when the person does not happen to be a lawyer, and would there be an advantage in hiring somebody for that position who is a lawyer?

Mr. SULLIVAN. The privilege is held by the corporation. And to the extent that, for example, outside counsel is acting at the behest of the corporation for purposes of pursing an internal investigation, individual employees who are interviewed by that counsel does not hold a privilege relationship with that investigating counsel. The privilege is held by the corporate entity, and it can be waived only through the exercise of a determination by management in consultation with the board.

Mr. DONOHUE. But Mr. Scott--

Mr. SCOTT. That is if you have a lawyer. If you have a non-lawyer in that position, he wouldn't have a privilege. Is that right?

Mr. DONOHUE. Yes. But even the lawyer--for example, as you can imagine in this town, the Chamber is full of lawyers. So if we looked at it as if it were a public company and I walked in the door and talked to any of the lot of lawyers, there is no implied privilege there.

The privilege is when you seek legal guidance from those people who are in a corporate position to give it and protect it. And so walking down to the cafeteria with any number of the lawyers that work for us in some other--and I think Mr. Sullivan--again, I am not paying him a fee--I think he would suggest that there would be no implied privilege there.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I would agree.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time is expired.

The distinguished gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FEENEY. Thank you.

General Thornburgh, you said you don't recall using this required waiver in prosecutions during your tenure as AG. You can think of, you know, briefly a hypothetical where it would be appropriate in order for a corporation to have considered to have cooperated where the attorney-client privilege would be waived, can you not?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I think there are certainly going to be situations where the corporation itself may take the initiative to waive the privilege in order to make available to the Government--

Mr. FEENEY. But off the top of your head, you can't think of where it would be appropriate for the Justice Department to waive--to require a waiver in order for the corporation to have considered cooperating?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I can't, but I wouldn't want to rule it out. I mean, there might be--

Mr. FEENEY. Okay. I think that is very telling.

And with that, you know, Mr. McCallum, I have to tell you, I am, you know, typically a huge supporter of giving the Justice Department the tools that it needs because these are very dangerous times, and we want to clean up Wall Street, Enron, and WorldCom. We're a disaster for investors.

But I would ask you: Have there been any successful prosecutions that you know of of major Wall Street fraud that would not have been successful in the absence of a required waiver?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I can't speak to that because I was not personally involved to a degree to be able to assess the strength or weaknesses of any of those cases.

I would, in response to the previous question, indicate to you, Mr. Feeney, that with respect to circumstances in which it would be clear that a waiver of attorney-client privilege might be necessary would be when the investigation implicates or creates suspicion regarding the general counsel's activity and whether that person is complicit within the fraud. That would be one, you know, prime example that is obvious.

But I can't talk to you with regard to the second question. I can't address the issue of would the prosecution of X have succeeded without a--

Mr. FEENEY. If you would be willing to give us a list, I think I would like to know that, Mr. Chairman, with unanimous consent of the committee, if you would be willing to go back and get us that information.

General Thornburgh?

Mr. THORNBURGH. Yeah. I want to amplify a bit my response. Under the crime-fraud exception, there is no privilege. So it's not a waiver of a privilege; it is that the privilege doesn't arise in the first place.

I want to say one thing, if I might. Having been one of those young, zealous prosecutors that Tom Donohue so eloquently described earlier on, I want to come to their defense. We want our prosecutors to use every single tool that is legally available to them. On the other hand, I don't want to castigate those prosecutors for the faults that we are speaking about today.

This, unfortunately, is a matter of Department policy. And they are empowered to pursue these waivers by the policy of the Department of Justice. And it is that level upon which this requires some redress.

Mr. FEENEY. I thank you, General Thornburgh. And on that one, I wanted to go back to Mr. McCallum.

Mr. McCallum, as I said, I tend to be a huge supporter of the tools the Justice Department needs. But I am not persuaded by the position of the Justice Department in this case--in this case yet. I mean, you start out your remarks by talking about the number of prosecutions.

My goal would be investor confidence and investor security. Prosecuting successfully lots of directors, CFOs, CEOs, and COOs is not necessarily the type of successful, clean Wall Street that I want to see.

And towards that end, you know, Mr. Donohue suggested that a lot of directors nowadays and top level management are spending a good portion, if not the majority of their time, not only building a better, cheaper, quality mousetrap, but on compliance with regulatory burdens and legal burdens. It doesn't seem like that helps investors, and it doesn't seem like that helps a solid corporate governance strategy.

You know, one of the concerns that I have is that if I am a director--let's assume hypothetically I am a director trying to do the right thing, which is to make profits for the shareholders and succeed in business. And let's assume for purposes of my hypothetical that even though I am a Congressman, I am an ethical guy. And let's assume, since it is my hypothetical, that I am trying to do the right thing.

If I have an accounting question, I want to go to my independent auditor. I am not allowed to do that under Sarbanes-Oxley. If there is a close call on a legal or ethical issue, I want to go to the corporation's general counsel. I am terrified to do that for the same reason that if I were a Catholic and there was no protection for things I said to my priest, I would be afraid to confess some of my sins and I would not be able to get the absolution that I were seeking.

So can you see that some of the things that we want to accomplish with solid corporate governance, with people focused on doing the right thing but making a profit for their shareholders, providing a better widget for the marketplace, can you see how some of these concerns--I am not worried about the Enron fraud case. I am worried about the guy trying to do the right thing and how he is afraid to talk to, in the one case, his accountants, and in this case, his lawyers.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Mr. Feeney, we certainly hear the arguments that are made by the business community on that side relating to the chilling effect. I would submit to you that our view of the compliance environment is indeed that corporations are spending more time on compliance. There is more regulatory supervision and oversight that has been imposed as a result of the corporate frauds. And I think that corporate governance is better off for it.

Rather than being deterred from seeking counsel from the general counsel, we believe that management is--in fact has been encouraged to seek advice and counsel, and there are any number of institutional investors who assess the legal risks and who try to determine whether there are compliance programs in place that are vigorously followed and that are effective. That has become part of the investment decision, that institutional investors make these days because of the frauds that--corporate frauds that have been experienced in the financial community over the--over the past 6, 7, 8 years.

Mr. FEENEY. Well, just one brief follow-up. If that is part of the investor decision-making process, does that account for the enormous flight into international investments and the fact that since Sarbanes-Oxley, for example, at that time 90 percent of foreign firms that went public raised 90 percent of their capital in the U.S. Today it's the reverse. Foreign corporations, not just because of Sarbanes-Oxley but because of the legal burden, are fleeing, and capital markets are moving overseas where there is no requirement for some of these things and these burdens.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Well, I think that doesn't speak to the issue of the improvements in corporate governance, corporate standards, and corporate citizenship within the United States. And there has been, I would submit, a restoration of confidence in the American corporate culture and in the American financial markets as a result of many of the regulatory oversight matters that have been instituted by the Congress and enforced by the Department of Justice.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman's time is expired.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DELAHUNT. Mr. McCallum, let me give you a chance to respond to part A. You know, what happened in the past decade since I left, you know, my previous career as a prosecutor? You know, what information do you receive now from waiver of the attorney-client privilege that absolutely cannot be developed from other mechanisms, other tools that have existed, you know, for the past 30, 40 years?

Mr. MCCALLUM. Well, Mr. Delahunt, there are three standards that are articulated in the Thompson Memorandum.

Mr. DELAHUNT. I am not interested in the standards. What I am interested in, you know, is in the course of an investigation, there are--there is a litany of investigative methods, mechanisms, and tools--we could repeat them--that are insufficient that have increased the reliance on the waiver.

Mr. MCCALLUM. All right. There are issues regarding the timeliness of the information and whether or not a particular criminal activity and the consequences of it can be addressed regardless of the investment of significant resources in an adequately--in a timely manner to respond to both the public need, the financial market needs.

Number two, the completeness of the information. I would submit to you that even in the investigations that you diligently pursued, you were not always confident that despite all of the efforts that you had used and all of the tools that you had used, that the information that you found was, in fact, complete. the whole story, all the facts, with all of the documents. And then--

Mr. DELAHUNT. I--go ahead. I am.

Mr. MCCALLUM. Excuse me. And then thirdly is the accuracy of that information. That is, there are subjective judgments that are necessarily made regarding the credibility of witnesses, the credibility of documentation, and all of that is--

Mr. DELAHUNT. Right. But documentation and witness credibility, they can all be tested via grand jury testimony. I mean, everything that you say I can envision occurring without the need to secure the waiver.

What I am concerned about, even--I think that, you know, there has been a restoration of confidence. I think that that in fact has happened as a result of legislative policy. I think it has happened probably because of aggressive enforcement. And I think that is good for our financial markets, and over time, I think it would attract capital as opposed to encourage its flight.

But I am concerned about the attorney-client privilege because I can see slippage in that privilege. You know, today it's, you know, the corporation. You know, tomorrow it's that priest, you know, that I might have gone to confession to. All right? I mean, it makes me very, very uncomfortable, and I really do think that this is a shortcut method to secure evidence that can be developed by alternative means.

You know, I thought Mr. Thornburgh made a good suggestion in terms of the review that alluded to. I would like to see you, the Department on its own, conduct a review. Get us some information. You know, get us some data. I mean, who is doing this and who is initiating it? Because it is a concern.

And, you know, I think that you can probably sense by the questions that have been posed, as well as observations by individual members, that there is a real concern here. And you don't want someone like Lungren from California, you know a far right conservative Republican, and Delahunt, this Northeast liberal, filing legislation on this because I think that is the order of magnitude that is being expressed here.

So respectfully, that is a message that I think you can bring back to Justice, is that there is concern about the Thompson/McCallum Memorandum. Okay?

Mr. MCCALLUM. I will certainly take that message back, Mr. Delahunt.

Mr. COBLE. And for the record, let me say that far left-winger and that far right-winger are both pretty good guys.

Gentlemen, before I forget it, I want to introduce into the record, without objection, coalition letters to preserve the attorney-client privilege.

[The coalition letters follow:]

* INSERT **********

Mr. COBLE. Gentleman, we thank you all very much for being here. In order to ensure a full record and adequate consideration of this issue, the record will be left open for additional submissions for 7 days. Any written questions that a member of the subcommittee wants to submit should also be submitted within the same 7-day period.

This concludes the oversight hearing on white collar enforcement, part 1, attorney-client privilege and corporate waivers. Thank you again, gentlemen. And the subcommittee stands adjourned.

[Whereupon, at 1:50 p.m., the subcommittee was adjourned.]

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Beach, Andrew
Sent: Wednesday, November 30, 2005 11:43 AM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Scolinos, Tasia; Gorsuch, Neil M; Nichols, Grant W; Wainstein, Kenneth; Rowan, Patrick (ODAG); Oldham, Jeffrey L
Cc: Washington, Tracy T; Shaw, Aloma A; Sours, Raquel; Nelson, Carrie; Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Jenkins, Linda A; Smith, Jeanette
Subject: Dec 1 travel to New York w/ AG

TO EVERYONE ON THE "TO" LINE:

You will be traveling with the Attorney General on THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1 to New York City for his Council on Foreign Relations speech. The AG will depart DOJ around 2:30 PM on Thursday afternoon and he is scheduled to return to [redacted] at approximately 9:15 PM. A DRAFT copy of the Attorney General's schedule will be sent to you later tonight or early tomorrow morning.

You will be departing from [redacted]. The phone number at [redacted].

QUESTION: Due to the late return hour tomorrow evening, please let me and Carrie Nelson know ASAP if you will drive yourself to [redacted] so that you have your car there when your return ... or if you will ride in the AG's motorcade out to the airport and take a cab from [redacted] on your return tomorrow evening.

For those wishing to ride in the AG's motorcade, we will arrange for a DOJ motorpool vehicle to follow the AG's vehicle out to the airport. The DOJ motorpool vehicle will depart from DOJ Main Justice's E Court. To get to E Court, use the elevator bank at the corner of 10th and Constitution Ave. N.W. Go down to basement ("B") level. As you exit the elevator, turn to the right and go through the door into E Court (outside). The AG's motorcade will be staged right there. Staff should board vehicles in advance of the AG's scheduled departure time.

If you drive yourself you may park in the parking lot in front of [redacted]. See weblink for map of the airport [redacted].

If you are driving yourself: please arrive at [redacted] no later than 2:25 PM on Thursday (unless otherwise instructed in a subsequent email). Although [redacted] is officially closed, the doors will be opened for the AG's trip. A member of the AG's FBI security detail will be in the lounge area at [redacted] to meet you, and direct you to the plane at the appropriate time. The lobby area at [redacted] is small enough that you will easily be able to find the FBI detail. If you are driving yourself, you are being asked to arrive early enough to depart as soon as the AG arrives.

You will be flying on an FBI leased aircraft to the airport in Teterboro, New Jersey, and back to Washington. There will be juice, soda and water on the plane. Flight time to Teterboro is about 1 hour. There will be a catered light dinner (a turkey wrap, chips, fruit, cookie, soda) provided on the return flight. Please let us know now if you do not wish to have us order that for you. There will be light refreshments available at a reception prior to the Council on Foreign Relations speech, but it is not a dinner event.

You or your secretary are responsible to complete your travel authorization form.

If you have any questions or need additional information, please feel free to contact the scheduling office.

Stephanie L. Franklin-Suber is a partner in the Business & Finance Department of Ballard Spahr Andrews & Ingersoll, LLP. She has extensive experience in commercial transactions, corporate governance, mergers, acquisitions and divestitures, joint venture, partnership and development agreements, and securities, investment company and investment adviser regulatory matters. She is a member of several special practice groups, including the Securities Group and the Mergers and Acquisitions Group, as well as the Biotechnology/Life Sciences Group, Energy and Project Finance Group and Technology and Emerging Companies Group. She also has extensive government experience, and specializes in public commercial transactions and contracting, economic and community development projects, public finance, and legislative, regulatory and government relations matters.

Ms. Franklin-Suber has developed, moderated and presented numerous continuing legal education programs on compliance with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, including the new corporate governance and attorney conduct requirements, and "Due Diligence Considerations in Business Transactions After Enron and Sarbanes-Oxley" for the American Bar Association, the National Bar Association, the Pennsylvania Bar Institute and Half Moon Seminars.

Prior to joining Ballard Spahr, Ms. Franklin-Suber was one of the highest-ranking women ever to serve in a Philadelphia mayoral administration when she was appointed Chief of Staff in January 2000 by Mayor John F. Street. As Chief of Staff, she served as a member of the Cabinet and was responsible for the overall administration of the Mayor's Office and the more than 30 City departments, commissions, and agencies in City government.

From 1996 to 1999, Ms. Franklin-Suber served as the City Solicitor for the City of Philadelphia. She was appointed Acting City Solicitor by Mayor Edward G. Rendell in November of 1996, confirmed as City Solicitor by unanimous vote of the City Council in December of 1996, and officially sworn in to office by Mayor Rendell in January of 1997.

As the chief legal officer for the City, she represented the Mayor, the Administration, the City Council, the City Controller, and more than 30 City departments, commissions, and agencies. She was the only woman and the youngest member of Mayor Rendell's Cabinet. As an Executive Department Head, she also managed the Law Department, which had a total workforce of approximately 340 lawyers, legal assistants, analysts, and support staff. Prior to her elevation to the position of City Solicitor in 1996, she served as Chair of the Corporate Group for the Law Department and a member of the Law Department Executive Committee from 1994 to 1996.

In both her capacity as Corporate Chair and City Solicitor, she served as lead counsel to the City on various significant transactions and litigation matters, including the 2000 Republican National Convention Service Agreements, the USAIRWAYS International and Commuter Terminals Project, the Gateway Visitors Center and Liberty Bell Project, the Delinquent Real Estate Tax Lien Sale and Securitization, the HealthChoices Behavioral Health System Agreements, the Curram-Frohmhold Prison Facilities Agreements, and the MarketPlace/Redwood International Airport Concession Agreement.

Prior to joining the City of Philadelphia Law Department in March of 1994, Ms. Franklin-Suber was a partner in the Business Department of Schnader Harrison Segal & Lewis, LLP. She joined the firm as an Associate in September 1986. In 1992, she became the first woman partner in the Business Department of this firm. She was the first African-American woman partner in the history of the firm.

From 1985 to 1986 she served as a Law Clerk to the Honorable Clifford Scott Green of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.. From 1983 to 1985, Ms. Franklin-Suber served as a Law Clerk to the Honorable A. Leon Higginbotham, Jr. of the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. She also served as Judge Higginbotham's research associate, teaching assistant, and lecturer at the University of Pennsylvania from 1982 to 1983. In addition, Ms. Franklin-Suber was an Adjunct Professor at the University of Pennsylvania Law School and taught Appellate Advocacy I in both the Fall of 1998 and 1999.

Ms. Franklin-Suber's professional associations and activities include membership in the American Bar Association, the National Bar Association, the Federal Bar Association, the Pennsylvania Bar Association, the Philadelphia Bar Association, the Barristers' Association of Philadelphia, Inc., and the National Bar Association Women Lawyers Division, Philadelphia Chapter. She is Co-Chair of the American Bar Association Minority Counsel Program and serves on the ABA Business Law Section Negotiated Acquisitions Committee and the ABA Graham-Leach-Bliley Act Task Force.

In addition, Ms. Franklin-Suber is a member of the ABA Minority Partners Conference and ABA Women Rainmakers as well as the DuPont Women Lawyers Network Business Development Committee. She recently served on the Philadelphia Bar Association's 2002 Hall of Fame Committee and is former Vice Chair of the Pennsylvania Bar Association Government Lawyers Committee. She has served as a member of the Advisory Board and as a past President of the Barristers' Association of Philadelphia, Inc. She served on the Host Committee for the 1999 National Bar Association Annual Convention and is a former member of the Board of Governors of the National Bar Association. She is a former member of the Board of Governors of the Philadelphia Bar Association and the Board of Trustees of the Philadelphia Bar Foundation.

In 2003, Ms. Franklin-Suber was appointed by Pennsylvania Governor Edward G. Rendell to the Governor's Standing Committee on Minority and Women Business Opportunities which advises the Department of General Services on minority and women-owned business certification and contracting matters. In 2002, she was appointed by Mayor John F. Street to the Philadelphia Gas Commission which oversees the management, operations and budget of the Philadelphia Gas Works. She was also appointed by former Pennsylvania Governor Robert P. Casey to the Governor's Advisory Commission on African-American Affair and by the Chief Judge of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania to the Federal Magistrates' Merit Selection Panel for the appointment and reappointment of federal magistrates. In 2004, she was appointed by Philadelphia Managing Director Phillip R. Goldsmith to the Behavioral Health Search Committee for the Cabinet-level position of Director of a newly-created Office of Behavioral Health and Mental Retardation Services.

Ms. Franklin-Suber's publications include "Keeping Thurgood Marshall's Promise-A Venerable Voice for Equal Justice," 16 Harvard Black Letter Law Journal, 27 (Spring 2000); "Remarks Made at Judge A. Leon Higginbotham's Funeral," IX Vital Issues: The Journal of African American Speeches 3 (1999); "Developing a Successful In-house Continuing Legal Education Program," Municipal Lawyer, Nov./Dec 1997; "The Unique Path of A. From 1996 to 1999, Ms. Franklin- Suber served as the City Solicitor for the City of Philadelphia. She was appointed Acting City Solicitor by Mayor Edward G. Rendell in November of 1996, confirmed as City Solicitor by unanimous vote of the City Council in December of 1996, and officially sworn in to office by Mayor Rendell in January of 1997. Under the Philadelphia Home Rule Charter, she served as the chief legal officer for the City, representing the Mayor, the Administration, the City Council, the City Controller, and more than 30 City departments, commissions, and agencies. She was the only woman and the youngest member of Mayor Rendell's Cabinet. As an Executive Department Head, she also directed the activities of the City of Philadelphia Law Department, which had a total workforce of approximately 340 lawyers, legal assistants, analysts, and support staff.

Prior to her elevation to the position of City Solicitor in 1996, she served as Chair of the Corporate Group for the City Law Department and a member of the Law Department Executive Committee from 1994 to 1996. In both her capacity as Corporate Chair and City Solicitor, she served as lead counsel to a wide variety of City officials, departments, agencies and commissions on various significant transactions and litigation matters, including the 2000 Republican National Convention Service Agreements, the USAIRWAYS International and Commuter Terminals Project, the Gateway Visitors Center and Liberty Bell Project, the Delinquent Real Estate Tax Lien Sale and Securitization, the HealthChoices Behavioral Health System Agreements, the Curram-Frohmhold Prison Facilities Agreements, and the MarketPlace/Redwood International Airport Concession Agreement.

Prior to joining the City of Philadelphia Law Department in March of 1994,

Ms. Franklin-Suber was with the Business Department of a large Philadelphia law firm. She joined the firm as an Associate in September 1986. In 1992, she became the first woman partner in the Business Department of this firm. She was the first African-American woman partner in the history of the firm. Her areas of concentration included commercial transactions, general corporate matters, general securities law and regulation, mergers, acquisitions and divestitures, joint venture and development agreements, and investment company and investment adviser regulatory matters. From 1985 to 1986 she served as a Law Clerk to the Honorable Clifford Scott Green of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. From 1983 to 1985, Ms. Franklin-Suber served as a Law Clerk to the Honorable A. Leon Higginbotham, Jr. of the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. She also served as Judge Higginbotham's research associate, teaching assistant, and lecturer at the University of Pennsylvania from 1982 to 1983.

In addition, Ms. Franklin-Suber was an Adjunct Professor at the University of Pennsylvania Law School and taught Appellate Advocacy I in both the Fall of 1998 and 1999. Ms. Franklin-Suber's professional associations and activities include the American Bar Association, the National Bar Association, the Federal Bar Association, the Pennsylvania Bar Association, the Philadelphia Bar Association, the Barristers' Association of Philadelphia, Inc., and the National Bar Association Women Lawyers Division, Philadelphia Chapter. She is currently a member of the ABA Business Law Section, the ABA Minority Partners Conference, ABA Women Rainmakers, and the ABA Minority Counsel Program. Ms. Franklin-Suber is also a member of the Business Development Committee of DuPont's Women Lawyers Network. She is currently serving on the Philadelphia Bar Association's 2002 Hall of Fame Committee. She served recently as Vice Chair of the Pennsylvania Bar Association Government Lawyers Committee. She has served as a member of the Advisory Board and as a past President of the Barristers' Association of Philadelphia, Inc. She served on the Host Committee for the 1999 National Bar Association Annual Convention and is a former member of the Board of Governors of the National Bar Association. She is a former member of the Board of Governors of the Philadelphia Bar Association and the Board of Trustees of the Philadelphia Bar Foundation. Ms. Franklin-Suber was appointed by former Governor Robert P. Casey to the Governor's Advisory Commission on African-American Affairs. She was also appointed by the Chief Judge of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania to the Federal Magistrates' Merit Selection Panel for the appointment and reappointment of federal magistrates.

Ms. Franklin-Suber's publications include "Keeping Thurgood Marshall's Promise-A Venerable Voice for Equal Justice," 16 Harvard Black Letter Law Journal, 27 (Spring 2000); "Remarks Made at Judge A. Leon Higginbotham's Funeral," IX Vital Issues: The Journal of African American Speeches 3 (1999); "Developing a Successful In-house Continuing Legal Education Program," Municipal Lawyer, Nov./Dec 1997; "The Unique Path of A. Inequality: A Journal of Theory and Practice, Aug. 1991; "Trash Collection: Judicial Decision on Pricing Threatens Municipalities' Ability to Provide Basic Service", The Authority, August, September 1987; "United States v. City of Philadelphia: A Continued Quest for and Effective Remedy for Police Misconduct", 7 Black L.J. 18 (1981). Ms. Franklin-Suber was recently profiled by the Pennsylvania Bar Association Government Lawyers Committee in "Serving the City of Brotherly Love," News & Views, Winter 1999. Among her many speaking engagements, she was the Luncheon Keynote Speaker at Eleanor Jean Hendley's Teenshop Awards Luncheon in June 2000. She was honored for her community service by the Associated Alumni of Central High School at its Annual Banquet in June 1999. She was the Featured Speaker of Phi Alpha Delta Pre-Law Fraternity International at Temple University Fox School of Business & Management in March 1999. She was the Luncheon Keynote Speaker at the University of Pennsylvania Black Law Student Association's Sadie T. M. Alexander Conference in March 1999. She was the Keynote Speaker at the American Bar Association's Young Lawyer's Conference on Public Service in October 1998. She was the Commencement Speaker at The Springside School Graduation in May 1997 and the Keynote Speaker at the "All for One" Conference for Independent Schools, hosted by The Springside School in November 1999.

Ms. Franklin-Suber is active in numerous civic and community associations and has received numerous awards and citations for outstanding and dedicated service, including: The Shirley Chisholm Award, Philadelphia Congress of the National Political Congress of Black Women (1999); The Outstanding Achievement Award, Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority, Inc. (1997); The Community Service Award, Schnader, Harrison Segal & Lewis (1997); and The Outstanding Young Leader of the Year Award Finalist, The Philadelphia Jaycees (1995, 1996). She recently served on the Advisory Board of the African- American Historical and Cultural Museum's Exhibit, "Call to Order: African Americans and the Law." Ms. Franklin-Suber is a graduate of the Springside School, Vassar College (B.A. 1979), and the University of Pennsylvania (J.D. 1982). She is presently a candidate for an LL.M. in Trial Advocacy at Temple University School of Law.

The Honorable Alberto R. Gonzales
Attorney General
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, D.C. 20530

Dear Attorney General Gonzales:

I write to request an update on the Justice Department's handling of detainee abuse allegations.

On June 17, 2004, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the indictment of a Central Intelligence Agency contractor for abusing an Afghan detainee. He stated that the Justice Department had also received one abuse referral from the Defense Department and "additional" abuse referrals from the CIA. He said, "These are ongoing investigations; I cannot offer further details at this time." Mr. Ashcroft announced that he was assigning all ongoing prisoner abuse cases to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Virginia.

It has been sixteen months since this announcement. I would appreciate your responses to the questions below.

Since the beginning of the conflict in Afghanistan, how many detainee abuse referrals has the Justice Department received from the Defense Department? For how many of these referrals were investigations opened? How many of these investigations have resulted in indictments? How many of these investigations are still ongoing? How many have been closed? What were the bases for closing these investigations?

Since the beginning of the conflict in Afghanistan, how many detainee abuse referrals has the Justice Department received from the CIA? For how many of these referrals were investigations opened? How many of these investigations have resulted in indictments? How many of these investigations are still ongoing? How many have been closed? What were the bases for closing these investigations?

In addition to investigations of detainee abuse resulting from Defense Department or CIA referrals, how many abuse investigations have been opened since the beginning of the conflict in Afghanistan? How many of these investigations have resulted in indictments? How many of these investigations are still ongoing? How many have been closed? What were the bases for closing these investigations?

Has the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of Virginia handled all detainee abuse cases? What have been the roles of the Criminal Division and the Civil Rights Division, if any, in these cases?

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Sincerely,

Richard J. Durbin

We're at the mercy of the FBI. I did ask them to expedite it and they said it should be done in a few weeks. They tell me this is a release for the state of Virginia that needs to be filled out. It takes the FBI approx 4-5 months on average to complete an initial background.

Is there any way we can speed this up? I find it hard to believe they have so many leads to complete given how long it has been since my initial interview, and I know I already signed a copy of the financial release form months ago.

Aloma,

Heard from the FBI and they [redacted]. In order to possibly speed things up I'm going to fax you a financial form that Neil needs to sign. This way, the FBI doesn't have to send an investigator to see him. This form is needed to verify state tax records. Please ask him to only sign, date, and put his address. The FBI fills out the rest. I will need you to mail this to me via Intraoffice mail as an original signature is needed. Please let me know when you mail it so I can be on the lookout for it and send it to the FBI. We are at 20 Massachusetts Ave, Room 6221 and put to my attention.

Please let me know your fax# so I can fax the form to you.

Thks,

Coordinated Federal Resources for BRAC Communities under the President's Economic Adjustment Committee and Defense Economic Adjustment Program

The following presents some of the Federal resources available to assist communities in alleviating the socioeconomic effects that may result from military base closures and realignments. Under Executive Order 12788, as amended, assistance for BRAC-impacted communities is coordinated across the Federal Government through the President's Economic Adjustment Committee (EAC). The Department of Defense's Office of Economic Adjustment (OEA) staffs the EAC and its Director is the EAC's Executive Director. Communities are encouraged to familiarize themselves with the following resources, including accessing program information through the provided internet links. OEA staff is available at (703) 604-6020 to address any questions you may have concerning the EAC, Federal assistance available to affected communities, or specific local needs that may exist. This listing will continually be updated and available at www.oea.gov.

Department of Defense

- The Office of Economic Adjustment (OEA) (www.oea.gov)

  OEA is the Department of Defense's primary source for assisting communities that are adversely impacted by Defense program changes, including base closures or realignments, base expansions, and contract or program cancellations. To assist affected communities, OEA manages and directs the Defense Economic Adjustment Program, and coordinates the involvement of other Federal Agencies.

  Economic adjustment assistance provides a community-based context for assessing economic hardships caused by DoD program changes by identifying and evaluating alternative courses of action, identifying resource requirements, and assisting in the preparation of an adjustment strategy or action plan to help communities help themselves.

  OEA staff has a range of experience in economic and community development, land use planning, real estate redevelopment, Federal real property programs, military programs, and worker adjustment. Project managers also bring a working knowledge of other Federal agencies and their respective programs to help communities put together an adjustment program combining Federal, State, local and private resources.

  Communities that are on the Secretary of Defense's BRAC 05 recommendations and desire additional resource information can visit http://www.oea.gov/oeaweb.nsf/BRAC?readform or call OEA at (703)-604-6020.

DOJ_NMG_0143601

- Civilian Personnel Management Services (CPMS)
  http://www.cpms.osd.mil
  CPMS supports the Under Secretary of Defense (Personnel and Readiness) in planning and formulating civilian personnel programs, providing policy support, functional information management and Department-wide human resources advisory services for the Military Departments and Defense agencies. Through CPMS, DoD administers the Civilian Assistance and Re-Employment (CARE) Program, which oversees the management of draw-downs and transition assistance programs and tools. The CARE Program consists of job placement programs such as the DoD Priority Placement Program (PPP), separation incentives such as Voluntary Separation Incentive Pay, and other benefits and services for civilian employees in career transition. CARE also provides direct program assistance to DoD activities affected by downsizing or reorganization.

  CPMS also hosts a BRAC transition assistance website (http://www.cpms.osd.mil/bractransition) designed to provide employees, managers, supervisors, and human resources specialists the latest information on BRAC, and the variety of transition assistance programs offered by the Department and other Federal agencies. In addition, the website answers questions concerning BRAC and transition programs, and links to websites that will help users learn more about BRAC, transition assistance, and employment opportunities.

  DoD uses a variety of tools to reduce staff while avoiding involuntary separations and meeting mission requirements, including:

  Job Placement

  - Priority Placement Program (PPP)
    The Priority Placement Program is the Department's principal mechanism for retaining employees who are adversely affected by reduction in force, transfer of function, base realignment and closure, and other downsizing and restructuring actions. Through its Automated Stopper and Referral System (ASARS), the skills of displaced employees are matched with vacant positions at DoD activities in the employees' selected geographic area of availability. If the new job involves a move to another location, the costs of moving the employee and his/her household are borne by the government in accordance with the Joint Travel Regulations. If the new job is at a lower grade level, the employee's grade or pay is saved to the maximum extent permitted by law.

  - Re-Employment Priority List (RPL)
    The RPL provides priority reemployment consideration for current and former DoD career and career-conditional competitive service employees, who are separated by reduction in force (RIF) or have received a RIF separation notice or Certificate of Expected Separation (CES). The RPL is also available to employees who are separated (or who accept a lower graded position instead of separation) due to compensable injury or disability and who fully recover more than one year from the date compensation is payable as described in 5 CFR Parts 330 and 353.

DOJ_NMG_0143602

Separation Programs

- Voluntary Separation Incentive Pay (VSIP)
  VSIP allows activities to offer incentive payments, or "buyouts," of up to $25,000 to encourage DoD employees to resign or retire. Buyouts are targeted to employees in specific grades, series, or locations, and are used to restructure the workforce or to help avoid RIF and minimize involuntary separations. Generally, activities must offer buyouts to their employees at least 30 days prior to the issuance of RIF notices. Buyouts are also referred to as "incentives," or "separation pay."

- Voluntary Early Retirement Authority (VERA)
  VERA is a management tool used to mitigate the affects of substantial delayering, RIF, reorganization, or transfer of function. Using the VERA, which is also referred to as "early retirement" or "early out," DoD activities may downsize or restructure the workforce by allowing employees to retire under reduced age and service requirements (age 50 with 20 years of service, or any age with 25 years of service). Under CSRS, the retirement annuity is reduced by 2 percent per year for each year the employee is under age 55. There is no reduction to a FERS annuity. VERA may be targeted to a specific segment of the workforce based on occupational series or grade; skills, knowledge, or other factors related to a position; organizational, geographical, non-personal and objective factors; or a combination of these factors. The Secretary of Defense redelegated the authority to use VERA to the Heads of the DoD Components for positions up to the GS-15 level (and equivalent) and authorizes further delegation to the lowest practicable level, but not lower than the local installation commander or activity head.

➢ Homeowner Assistance Program (HAP)
The Department of Defense Homeowner's Assistance Program provides assistance to eligible federal personnel (military and civilian), who are stationed at or near an installation scheduled for closure or realignment and who, through no fault of their own, are unable to sell their homes under reasonable terms and conditions. The program provides assistance to eligible applicants in three ways: the Government may purchase the applicant's home by paying off the balance of any mortgage existing at the time of the closure or realignment announcement, or for 75% of the fair market value prior to the announcement, whichever is higher; applicants who are able to sell their homes may be reimbursed for part of their losses or, in some cases, paid at the time of closing; and, applicants who defaulted on their mortgage through foreclosure may receive financial assistance. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers is the executive agent with overall responsibility for administering the program. Information concerning HAP is available at http://www.sas.usace.army.mil/hapinv/hapinfo.htm

DOJ_NMG_0143603

Department of Labor

- New Resources for States and Communities
  - Workforce Investment Act (WIA) National Emergency BRAC Planning Grants -
    The Secretary of Labor is issuing guidance to States regarding the availability of National Emergency Grant (NEG) funds to begin planning for layoffs that will occur as a result of BRAC 05. Priority will be given to States that are likely to face the largest impact. The first round of funds will be issued to impacted States by June 30, 2005.

  - Coordination Between Rapid Response Officials and DOD Human Resource Officers
    The U.S. Department of Labor has advised State Rapid-Response coordinators (individuals who coordinate the State-level response to mass-layoffs) of the opportunity to participate in DoD's 2005 Worldwide Human Resources Conference in Southbridge, MA July 18-21. This conference will help State Rapid-Response coordinators and DoD Human Resource officers from across the country make connections and coordinate strategies.

- Resources for Workers and Businesses
  - BRAC-Coach Web-Site
    www.Brac-Coach.org
    To further aid communities impacted by BRAC actions, DOL has created this online tool to assist workers, businesses, and workforce professionals who may be affected by a local base realignment or closure.

  - Toll-Free Hotline
    1-877-US2-JOBS
    Operators will have BRAC-specific talking points to refer callers to local programs, including One-Stop Career Centers for assistance.

  - One-Stop Career Center One Stop Services
    www.servicelocator.org; 1-877-US2-JOBS
    One-Stop Career Centers are the focal point of the workforce investment system, supporting the employment needs of job seekers and the human resource needs of businesses. Transitioning workers (BRAC impacted workers, veterans, military spouses, and others) can access career guidance, information on available jobs, job search assistance, information on training availability, training and educational opportunities, and job placement services. Laid-off workers may also access temporary income support and more intensive services to assist with child-care and transportation needs.

Housing & Urban Development

- Community Development Block Grants (CDBG)
  http://www.hud.gov/offices/cpd/communitydevelopment/programs/index.cfm.
  Begun in 1974, the Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) is one of the oldest programs in HUD. This program provides Federal funds for community and economic development projects. The program supports job creation and retention efforts, local government efforts to provide affordable infrastructure systems and community efforts to improve the quality of life for low- to moderate-income citizens. The CDBG program provides annual grants on a formula basis (hence the term entitlement communities) based on the population of the community.

- Small Cities Block Grant (SCBG)
  http://www.hud.gov/offices/cpd/communitydevelopment/programs/index.cfm
  The Small Cities Block Grant program (SCBG) provides Federal funds for community and economic development projects to cities not in the CDBG "entitlement" program. The program supports job creation and retention efforts, local government efforts to provide affordable infrastructure systems and community efforts to improve the quality of life for low- to moderate-income citizens. These funds are first provided to States, which in turn make them available to smaller communities.

- Homeless Assistance (Technical & Financial)
  http://www.hud.gov/offices/cpd/homeless/library/milbase/index.cfm
  For over three decades the Department of Defense has been closing or consolidating domestic military installations to reduce overhead. Communities where these bases were located are charged with the responsibility of finding alternative uses for them once they have been closed.

  In 1987, Congress passed the McKinney Homeless Assistance Act, which made serving the homeless the first priority for use of all surplus Federal properties, including military facilities. In 1994 the Base Closure Community Redevelopment and Homeless Assistance Act (the Redevelopment Act) was passed, superseding the McKinney Act for most base closure buildings and properties.

  The Act itself was the end result of recommendations made by HUD, the Department of Defense, Veterans Affairs, the General Services Administration, and the Department of Health and Human Services. The Redevelopment Act accommodates the impacted communities' multiple interests in base reuse as well as to meet national priorities for homeless assistance. To help communities gain a greater understanding of the provisions of the Act, and to assist them in implementing the law in a fair and consistent manner, HUD published the Guidebook on Military Base Reuse and Homeless Assistance.

  The Guidebook includes an overview of the base redevelopment process, reviews consolidated and redevelopment plans, offers model base reuse plans, and provides guidance for communities seeking additional sources of assistance with HUD Homeless Assistance Programs. For further information, please contact Linda Charest, Coordinator of HUD's Base Redevelopment Team, by phone at (202) 708-1234, ext. 2595 or by e-mail.

  The Guidebook is also available on HUD's Web site in two electronic versions. One is an interactive version that can be read online. The other is an Adobe .PDF document and can be downloaded directly to your computer. Please note that in order to view the .PDF version a downloadable viewer must be installed on your computer.

- Self Help Homeownership Opportunity Program (SHOP)
  http://www.hud.gov/offices/cpd/affordablehousing/programs/shop/index.cfm
  SHOP provides funds for eligible non-profit organizations to purchase home sites and develop or improve the infrastructure needed to set the stage for sweat equity and volunteer-based homeownership programs for low-income persons and families. SHOP is authorized by the Housing Opportunity Program Extension Act of 1996, Section 11, and is subject to other Federal crosscutting requirements.

- Native American Assistance
  http://www.hud.gov/groups/nativeamericans.cfm
  HUD offers a range of programs, assistance, and loan programs specifically for Native American tribes, organizations, and sometimes individuals. See website for details.

Department of Commerce

- Economic Development Programs
  http://www.eda.gov/AboutEDA/Programs.xml
  The Economic Development Administration (EDA) has provided grants that have leveraged private sector and local public sector dollars for targeted investments to alleviate the sudden economic dislocation caused by base closures. Total EDA grants from additional appropriations made for bases closed in 1988, 1991, 1993 and 1995 exceeded $640 million. Additionally, EDA received approximately $274 million from the Department of Defense and $8 million from the Department of Energy in appropriations for specially targeted defense adjustment projects. These grants provided substantial funds for a range of services including: infrastructure development, technology initiatives, revolving loan funds and other economic development strategies. EDA's Economic Adjustment Program predominantly supported three types of grant activities: strategic planning, project implementation, and Revolving Loan Funds (RLF's). Implementation grants supported one or more activities identified in an EDA approved Comprehensive Economic Development Strategy (CEDS).

- Communities economically impacted by major base closures or realignments may be eligible for funding under EDA's Planning, Technical Assistance and Public Works programs.

Department of Transportation

- Airport Improvement Program (AIP)
  http://www.faa.gov/arp/financial/aip/overview.cfm?ARPnav=aip
  The AIP provides grants to public agencies for the planning and development of public use airports that are in the National Plan for Integrated Airports System (NPIAS). The Federal share of eligible costs for large and medium primary hub airports is 75%, with the exception of the noise program which is 80%. For remaining airports (small hub, non-hub, primary relievers, and general aviation airports) the participation is 95%. The AIP was funded at about $3.4 billion in FY 2003 from the Aviation Trust Fund.

- Military Airport Program (MAP)
  http://www.faa.gov/arp/planning/map/index.cfm?nav=map
  The MAP was established in Federal law (49USC 47118) to place special emphasis on the development of appropriate former military (closed under BRAC) and existing joint use military airports. This is a set-aside in the Aviation Trust Fund, representing $35 million in FY 2005, or about 4% (49USC47117) of the discretionary part of the full AIP appropriation. Competition for the limited number of slots in this program is keen because regulations allow funding of certain capital improvements that are not allowed under the main AIP. MAP grants can be used for projects not generally funded by the AIP, such as: surface parking lots, fuel farms, hangars, terminals, utility systems (on and off the airport), access roads and cargo buildings

Small Business Administration

- Small Business Loans
  http://www.sba.gov/financing/
  SBA offers numerous financing programs to assist small businesses. SBA has been assisting businesses with their financing needs since 1953.

- Office of Entrepreneurial Development Programs
  - Small Business Development Centers
    http://www.sba.gov/sbdc/
    SBDCs offer one-stop assistance to individuals and small businesses by providing a wide variety of information and guidance in central and easily accessible branch locations. The program is a cooperative effort of the private sector, the educational community and Federal, State and local governments.

  - Small Business Training Network
    http://www.sba.gov/training/
    The Small Business Training Network, sponsored by the Office of Entrepreneurial Development, is a virtual campus housing free training courses, workshops and knowledge resources designed to assist entrepreneurs and other students of enterprise.

  - Business & Community Initiatives
    http://www.sba.gov/bi/
    The Office engages in co-sponsorships with private sector partners who are designed to provide small business owners with information, education and training that is cost-effective, of high quality and reflective of trends in small business development. As a result of these co-sponsorships, small businesses receive a broad variety of education and training opportunities, written materials, and other forms of assistance that are provided free of charge or at extremely low cost.

  - Women's Business Ownership
    http://www.sba.gov/ed/wbo/index.html
    SBA's Office of Women's Business Ownership (OWBO) is leading the way.
    OWBO promotes the growth of women-owned businesses through programs that address business training and technical assistance, and provide access to credit and capital, Federal contracts, and international trade opportunities.

- Historically Underutilized Business Zone Programs (HUBZones)
  https://eweb1.sba.gov/hubzone/internet/
  The HUBZone Empowerment Contracting Program stimulates economic development and creates jobs in urban and rural communities by providing Federal contracting preferences to small businesses. These preferences go to small businesses that obtain HUBZone (Historically Underutilized Business Zone) certification in part by employing staff who live in a HUBZone.

Department of Education

- Impact Aid Program
  http://www.ed.gov/about/offices/list/oese/impactaid/index.html
  The mission of the Impact Aid Program is to disburse Impact Aid payments to local educational agencies that are financially burdened by Federal activities and to provide technical assistance and support services to staff and other interested parties.

- Educational Conveyance
  The Secretary of Education has the legislative authority to sell and convey Federal real property to States, their political subdivisions, colleges, universities, public and private non-profit school systems and other education organizations at public benefit allowance discounts up to 100% off the current fair market value of the available property.

Department of Treasury

- New Markets Tax Credits (NMTC)
  http://www.cdfifund.gov/programs/programs.asp?programID=5
  The NMTC Program attracts private-sector capital investment into the nation's urban and rural low-income areas to help finance community development projects, stimulate economic growth and create jobs. The NMTC program, established by Congress in December of 2000, permits individual and corporate taxpayers to receive a credit against Federal income taxes for making qualified equity investments in investment vehicles known as Community Development Entities (CDEs). Substantially all of the investor dollars must in turn be used by the CDE to provide investments in low-income communities. NMTCs are allocated annually by the Fund to CDEs under a competitive application process. Throughout the life of the NMTC Program, the Fund is authorized to allocate to CDEs the authority to issue to their investors up to the aggregate amount of $15 billion in equity as to which NMTCs can be claimed.

- Community Development Finance Institutions (CDFI) Program
  http://www.cdfifund.gov/programs/programs.asp?programID=7
  Through the CDFI Program, the Fund provides financial assistance to certified CDFIs that demonstrate the ability to leverage non-Federal dollars to support comprehensive business plans of providing services to create community development impact in underserved markets. The CDFI Program also provides technical assistance to existing and emerging CDFIs to build their capacity to serve their communities.

Department of Homeland Security

- First Responder Assistance Programs
  http://www.dhs.gov/dhspublic/interapp/editorial/editorial_0355.xml
  The objective is to enhance the capacity of State and local first responders in response to a "weapons of mass destruction" (WMD) incident involving chemical, biological, radiological, nuclear, and explosive devices. Funds will be used to provide support for planning and conducting exercises at the National, State, and local levels.

Department of Veteran Affairs

- Various Programs Available
  http://www.va.gov
  The Department of Veterans Affairs administers a wide range of programs to assist veterans. These programs provide critical resources that veterans may access when services provided at military bases (particularly medical care) are no longer available as a result of base realignment or closure.

Environmental Protection Agency

- Technical Outreach Services for Communities (TOSC)
  http://www.toscprogram.org
  The Technical Outreach Services for Communities (TOSC) program helps citizens better understand the hazardous contamination issues in or near their communities by providing free, independent, non-advocate, technical assistance about contaminated sites. TOSC taps into the technical expertise of the university environmental researchers that will best meet community's needs.

- Technical Outreach Services for Native American Communities (TOSNAC) http://bridge.ecn.purdue.edu/~tosnac/
  The Technical Outreach Services for Native American Communities (TOSNAC) program provides technical assistance to Native Americans dealing with hazardous substance issues. It provides first contact, needs assessment, initial support, and long-term technical support arrangements by regional TOSC programs and other resources, as necessary.

- Technical Assistance Grants (TAG)
  http://www.epa.gov/superfund/tools/tag/
  BRAC installations that are on the EPA's National Priorities List (NPL), or proposed to be listed, may be eligible for Technical Assistance Grants (TAGs). An initial grant up to $50,000 is available to qualified community groups so they can contract with independent technical advisors to interpret and help the community understand technical information about their site.

- Regional Public Liaison (Regional Ombudsman)
  http://www.epa.gov/superfund/programs/reforms/reforms/3-19.htm#res
  The Regional Public Liaison serves an ombudsman function for Superfund cleanups. The Regional Public Liaison is responsible for resolving concerns and for providing guidance to regional personnel and to stakeholders, including the community. Communities with concerns about Superfund BRAC site cleanup activities may contact the established Regional Public Liaison if the community feels their concerns are not adequately addressed through normal channels. The Regional Public Liaison serves as a direct point of contact for the public on Superfund concerns; he/she has the ability to look independently into problems and facilitate the communication that can lead to a solution.

THE PRESIDENT

EXECUTIVE ORDER 12788 As AMENDED

Defense Economic Adjustment Program

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and the laws of the United States of America, including 10 U.S.C. 2391 and the Defense Economic Adjustment, Diversification, Conversion, and Stabilization Act of 1990, enacted as Division D, section 4001 et seq., of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1991, Public Law 101-510, and to provide coordinated Federal economic adjustment assistance necessitated by changes in Department of Defense activities, it is hereby ordered as follows:

Section 1. Function of the Secretary of Defense. The Secretary of Defense shall, through the Economic Adjustment Committee, design and establish a Defense Economic Adjustment Program.

Sec. 2. The Defense Economic Adjustment Program shall (1) assist substantially and seriously affected communities, businesses, and workers from the effects of major Defense base closures, realignments, and Defense contract-related adjustments, and (2) assist State and local governments in preventing the encroachment of civilian communities from impairing the operational utility of military installations.

Sec. 3 Functions of the Defense Economic Adjustment Program. The Defense Adjustment Program shall:

(a) Identify problems of States, regions, metropolitan areas, or communities that result from major Defense base closures, realignments, and Defense contract-related adjustments, and the encroachment of the civilian community on the mission of military installations and that require Federal assistance;

(b) Use and maintain a uniform socioeconomic impact analysis to justify the use of Federal economic adjustment resources prior to particular realignments;

(c) Apply consistent policies, practices, and procedures in the administration of Federal programs that are used to assist Defense-affected States, regions, metropolitan areas, communities, and businesses;

(d) Identify and strengthen existing agency mechanisms to coordinate employment opportunities for displaced agency personnel;

(e) Identify and strengthen existing agency mechanisms to improve reemployment opportunities for dislocated Defense industry personnel;

(f) Assure timely consultation and cooperation with Federal, State, regional, metropolitan, and community officials concerning Defense-related impacts on Defense-affected communities' problems;

(g) Assure coordinated interagency and intergovernmental adjustment assistance concerning Defense impact problems;

(h) Prepare, facilitate, and implement cost-effective strategies and action plans to coordinate interagency and intergovernmental economic adjustment efforts;

(i) Encourage effective Federal, State, regional, metropolitan, and community cooperation and concerted involvement of public interest groups and private sector organizations in Defense economic adjustment activities;

(j) Serve as a clearinghouse to exchange information among Federal, State, regional, metropolitan, and community officials involved in the resolution of community economic adjustment problems. Such information may include, for example, previous studies, technical information, and sources of public and private financing;

(k) Assist in the diversification of local economies to lessen dependence on Defense activities;

(l) Encourage and facilitate private sector interim use of lands and buildings to generate jobs as military activities diminish;

(m) Develop ways to streamline property disposal procedures to enable Defense-impacted communities to acquire base property to generate jobs as military activities diminish; and

(n) Encourage resolution of regulatory issues that impede encroachment prevention and local economic adjustment efforts.

Sec. 4. Economic Adjustment Committee.

(a) Membership. The Economic Adjustment Committee ("Committee") shall be composed of the following individuals or a designated principal deputy of these individuals, and such other individuals from the executive branch as the President may designate. Such individuals shall include the:

(1) Secretary of Agriculture;
(2) Attorney General;
(3) Secretary of Commerce;

(4) Secretary of Defense;
(5) Secretary of Education;
(6) Secretary of Energy;
(7) Secretary of Health and Human Services;
(8) Secretary of Housing and Urban Development;
(9) Secretary of Interior;
(10) Secretary of Labor;
(11) Secretary of State;
(12) Secretary of Transportation;
(13) Secretary of Treasury;
(14) Secretary of Veterans Affairs;
(15) Secretary of Homeland Security;
(16) Chairman, Council of Economic Advisers;
(17) Director of the Office of Management and Budget;
(18) Director of the Office of Personnel Management;
(19) Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency;
(20) Administrator of General Services;
(21) Administrator of the Small Business Administration; and
(22) Postmaster General.

(b) The Secretary of Defense, or the Secretary's designee, shall chair the Committee.

(c) The Secretaries of Labor and Commerce shall serve as Vice Chairmen of the Committee. The Vice Chairmen shall co-chair the Committee in the absence of both the Chairman and the Chairman's designee and may also preside over meetings of designated representatives of the concerned executive agencies.

(d) Executive Director. The head of the Department of Defense's Office of Economic Adjustment shall provide all necessary policy and administrative support for the Committee and shall be responsible for coordinating the application of the Defense Economic Adjustment Program to Department of Defense activities.

(e) Duties. The Committee shall:
(1) Advise, assist, and support the Defense Economic Adjustment Programs;
(2) Develop procedures for ensuring that State, regional, and community officials, and representatives of organized labor in those States, municipalities, localities, or labor organizations that are substantially and seriously affected by changes in Defense expenditures, realignments or closures, or cancellation or curtailment of major Defense contracts, are notified of available Federal economic adjustment programs; and
(3) Report annually to the President and then to the Congress on the work of the Economic Adjustment Committee during the preceding fiscal year.

Sec. 5. Responsibilities of Executive Agencies.

(a) The head of each agency represented on the Committee shall designate an agency representative to:
(1) Serve as a liaison with the Secretary of Defense's economic adjustment staff;
(2) Coordinate agency support and participation in economic adjustment assistance projects; and
(3) Assist in resolving Defense-related impacts on Defense-affected communities.

(b) All executive agencies shall:
(1) Support, to the extent permitted by law, the economic adjustment assistance activities of the Secretary of Defense. Such support may include the use and application of personnel, technical expertise, legal authorities, and available financial resources. This support may be used, to the extent permitted by law, to provide a coordinated Federal response to the needs of individual States, regions, municipalities, and communities adversely affected by necessary Defense changes; and
(2) Afford priority consideration to requests from Defense-affected communities for Federal technical assistance, financial resources, excess or surplus property, or other requirements, that are part of a comprehensive plan used by the Committee.

Sec. 6. Judicial Review. This order shall not be interpreted to create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law by a party against the United States, its agencies, its officers, its agents, or any person.

Sec. 7. Construction. (a) Nothing in this order shall be construed as subjecting any function vested by law in, or assigned pursuant to law to, any agency or head thereof to the authority of any other agency or officer or as abrogating or restricting any such function in any manner.

(b) This order shall be effective immediately and shall supersede Executive Order No 12049.

EDA's Defense Economic Adjustment Program

Base Realignment and Closure 2005

October 2005

EDA's Role in BRAC 2005

- EDA's role in Base Realignments and Closure (BRAC) 2005 is governed by Executive Order 12788.
- Signed in January 1992, and updated in May of 2005, Executive Order 12788 serves as the coordinating mechanism for the federal government's response to communities impacted by BRAC.
- Pursuant to this Executive Order the Secretary of Commerce serves as Co-Vice Chair (with the Secretary of Labor) of the President's Economic Adjustment Committee.

EDA's Mission and Role in Defense Economic Adjustment

Mission Statement

EDA's mission is to lead the federal economic development agenda by promoting innovation and competitiveness, preparing American regions for growth and success in the worldwide economy.

Defense Economic Adjustment

EDA operates the federal government's largest program for defense economic adjustment at the community level.

What EDA Brings to the Table

- Flexibility - EDA develops projects at the local level. Priorities are community specific.
- Leadership - EDA's portfolio includes significant contributions to hundreds of communities across the country.

EDA targets its investment assistance to attract private capital investment and create higher-skill, higher-wage jobs in those communities and regions that are suffering from high level of economic distress. EDA investments are focused on locally-developed, regionally-based economic development initiatives that achieve the highest return on the taxpayers' investment and that directly contribute to regional and national economic growth.

EDA Program Tools – Economic Adjustment

Economic Adjustment Program

EDA's Economic Adjustment Program assists state and local interests to design and implement strategies to adjust or bring about change to an economy. The program focuses on areas that have experienced or are under threat of serious structural damage to the underlying economic base.

EDA Program Tools - Economic Adjustment

The Economic Adjustment Program predominantly supports two types of investment activities:

- Strategic Planning - Strategy investments help organize and carry out a planning process resulting in a Comprehensive Economic Development Strategy (CEDS) tailored to the community's specific economic problems and opportunities.
- Project Implementation - Implementation investments support one or more activities identified in an EDA-approved CEDS. Activities may include, but are not limited to, the creation/expansion of strategically targeted business development and financing programs such as, construction of infrastructure improvements, organizational development and market or industry research and analysis.

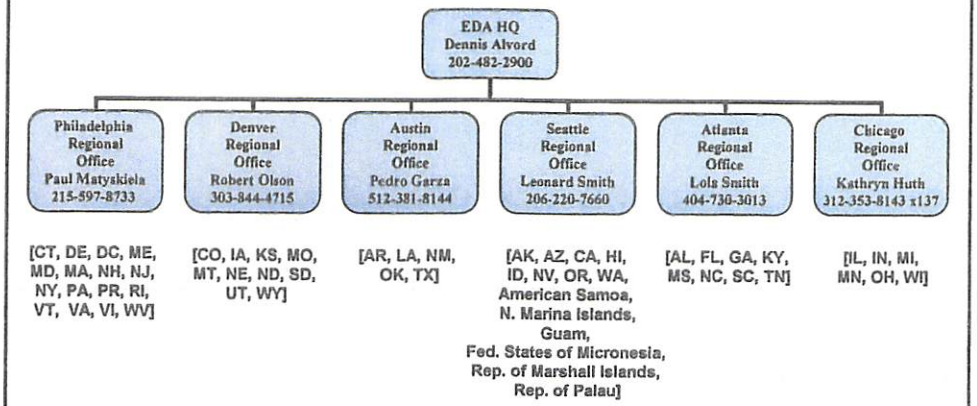
BRAC 2005: "Simplified" Redevelopment Process

A step-by-step approach:

- Step 1: Organize the Planning Group
- Step 2: Create the Reuse Strategy/Plan*
- Step 3: Begin Plan Implementation
- Step 4: Property Disposal & Environmental Cleanup
- Step 5: Redevelopment Project Implementation

EDA supports BRAC reuse efforts at two stages: economic recovery strategy development and redevelopment project implementation.

* In coordination with OEA.



EDA's Role – Our Legacy

- Since 1992, EDA has awarded $646 million in 385 investments in approximately 113 counties across 38 states affected by 103 base closures.
- EDA received roughly $274 million from the Department of Defense (DOD) and $8 million from Department of Energy (DOE) appropriations for specially targeted defense adjustment projects.
- Of the previous BRAC Rounds, 21 communities have enjoyed over 150% civilian jobs recovery rate; 20 of these did it with assistance from the Economic Development Administration.

Nuts and Bolts: Working with EDA

- Interested applicants are encouraged to contact the appropriate EDA Regional Office to discuss their proposal and obtain specific EDA program information, application instructions and forms. EDA regulations and other information are available on the EDA website: http://www.eda.gov.

DoD BRAC Implementation

- Military Departments and affected Defense Agencies will:
  - Prepare "Business Plans" that delineate required actions, their timing, and necessary resources
    - Plans will serve as the foundation for the complex program management required, and support initial operational/budgetary estimates and allocation of BRAC resources
  - Consult/coordinate with other affected organizations (losing/gaining installations), operating entities, and Joint Cross-Service Groups to ensure effective implementation
- Established Infrastructure Steering Group (ISG) and Installation Capabilities Council (ICC) review responsibility

BRAC Implementation - Organization

BRAC Implementation – DoD

- Involves
  - Designing and building facilities at gaining installations
  - Moving personnel and equipment
  - Examining the environmental conditions at both gaining and losing installations
  - Environmental cleanup
  - Disposing of excess property

Environmental Strategy

- Follow the law and streamline the process
- Cleanups/ site characterizations well advanced and publicly available
- Good site characterization vital
- Environmental Condition of Property (ECP) key
  - Maximizes use of existing data and studies
  - Information updated and gaps filled
  - Developed ASAP after BRAC list to aid reuse planning
  - End result similar to Environmental Baseline Survey

Guiding Principles - Implementation

1. Act expeditiously whether closing or realigning
2. Fully utilize all appropriate means to transfer property
3. Rely on and leverage market forces
4. Collaborate effectively
5. Speak with one voice

Rulemaking

- Published in Federal Register August 9, 2005
- Comment Period Closed October 11, 2005
- 24 Commenters as of close date (may still be some in the mail)
- Highlights:
  - Conforms the regulation to statutory changes since the last BRAC round
  - More closely tracks the statutory requirements than current regulation
  - Reflects updated DoD policy

BRAC Implementation - DEAP

Defense Economic Adjustment Program (DEAP)

Purpose: To assist communities, businesses and individuals adversely impacted by changes in Defense activities, such as BRAC, by providing coordinated Federal economic adjustment assistance.

Examples:

- School impact aid
- Worker adjustment assistance
- Federal sponsored public benefit conveyance
- Infrastructure improvements
- Economic development assistance

Roles of EAC Members

- Identify & involve key Agency decision-makers
- Engage their Agency in support of the Defense Economic Adjustment Program
- Respond to requests from the EAC Executive Director on behalf of the Chair
- Track participation in BRAC issues
- Afford priority consideration to requests from Defense-affected communities for technical assistance, financial resources, excess or surplus property or other requirements

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20530-0001

Dear Attorney General Gonzales:

The sequence of events culminating in the dismissal of [redacted] is very troubling. At best, your Department took far too long to act on accusations against the [redacted] that were sufficiently serious as to lead you ultimately to decide to dismiss him, and that is the most favorable possible interpretation that can be put on your actions. A more persuasive explanation is that having been forced by the information in the Boston Globe to look into this situation, and having received from the Inspector General a very damning report about [redacted] work habits, the Justice Department planned to take no action until its hand was forced by the Globe's publicizing the report through a Freedom of Information Request.

No one is arguing that dismissal of [redacted] should have followed immediately upon publication of the Globe series in October. It was reasonable to ask the Inspector General to look into this, then to give [redacted] a chance to respond to their findings, and finally to decide what should be done based on the Inspector General's findings and [redacted] response. But every step of this process appears to have taken far longer than was reasonable, and in particular, the lapse in time between the Inspector General's report in March and the ultimate decision to dismiss [redacted] in August means that for months this important position in Massachusetts was filled by someone who your Department believed had faltered in his right to hold it, and who was not administering its important duties in a proper fashion. Several questions must be answered. First, why was there a delay – as the Globe has reported – between the Inspector General's report being completed in March, and [redacted] being asked for his response in May? Second, why did that response take so long - again according to the Globe, it was not submitted until July. Since [redacted] is being asked to account for his own work habits, it is very difficult to understand why this took two or more months.

The next question is why there was a delay until late August in your Department's decision to act on the matter? The fact that your Department refused to make the report public until the Globe filed the Freedom of Information Act request adds weight to the suspicion that you had hoped to be able to take either no action on the report, or action of the most minimal sort, and it stretches belief in coincidence beyond the breaking point to suggest that your decision to fire [redacted] so many months after the Inspector General's report was independently arrived at shortly after the Globe published its article based on the findings in that report.

The inference that your Department's actions in this matter were motivated by a desire to avoid acknowledging a political embarrassment is strengthened by the contrast between the long delay in acting against [redacted] and what appears to have been the more prompt decision by your Department to penalize a Justice Department appointee who resisted efforts to minimize the significance of statistics documenting unfair treatment of racial minorities in some law enforcement situations.

It is important for people to know that political considerations are not unduly affecting law enforcement administration, and that makes your answers to these questions and your explanation of the sequence of events of the utmost importance.

BY COURIER

To: Mrs. Sheila C. Joy
United States Department of Justice
Office of Legal Policy

From: James A. Bourke
Chief
Special Inquiry and General
Background Investigations Unit
Federal Bureau of Investigation

Subject: Immigration Addendum to the SF-86

When conducting background investigations for the Office of Policy Development, one of the steps taken is to verify the naturalized citizenship or legal alien status of the candidate, and, depending upon the type of background investigation requested, all foreign-born close relatives, cotenants, and domestic help that reside with the candidate. In order for this verification to be conducted in a timely, effective and efficient manner, it is necessary for certain information to be provided to the FBI at the same time as the request for investigation.

Currently, the prospective candidate utilizes the SF-86 (revised September 1995) to provide the FBI with information concerning his or her citizenship or alien status and that of their relatives and cotenants. Recently, the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) has informed my office that having other information in addition to that requested on the SF-86, which includes exact name of an individual at the time of their entry, will allow the naturalization or alien status of that individual to be verified more quickly in a timely manner as the majority of INS files are maintained and retrieved by the individual's entry name. The INS utilizes the alien registriation numbers and the certification numbers, along with the entry name, to locate the correct file of an individual for review. Although the SF-86 requires the candidate to provide certificate numbers, it does not ask for the person's exact name at the time of entry, an alien registration number, place or date of entry or place or date of naturalization.

The FBI has developed the enclosed document entitled "Immigration Addendum to the SF-86." (copy attached) This form allows the candidate to provide to the FBI all the information necessary to verify an individual's naturalization or legal alien status. It is requested that you use this form whenever the candidate, his or her close relatives or his or her cotenants were not U.S. citizens at birth. The use of this addendum to obtain the needed information would be of great benefit to the candidate, the FBI, the INS, and ultimately your office, to facilitate an efficient background investigation process The attached addendum copy may be duplicated as necessary.

It is suggested that any supplemental instructions you provide along with the SF-86 be amended to address the use of the enclosed addendum.

If you have any questions concerning this matter, please contact me or Supervisory Personnel Security Specialists [redacted]

COMSEC ACCESS BRIEFING

You have been selected to perform duties requiring access to sensitive COMSEC information. It is, therefore, essential that you are made fully aware of certain facts relative to the protection of this information before access is granted. This briefing will provide you with a description of the types of COMSEC information you may have access to, the reasons why special safeguards are necessary for protecting this information, the directives and rules, which prescribe those safeguards, and the penalties that you will incur for willful disclosure of this information to unauthorized persons.

COMSEC equipment and keying material are especially sensitive because they are used to protect other sensitive information against unauthorized access during the process of communicating that information from one point to another. Any particular piece of COMSEC equipment, keying material, or other cryptographic material may be the critical element, which protects large amounts of sensitive information from interception, analysis, and exploitation. If the integrity of the COMSEC system is weakened at any point, all the sensitive information protected by that system might be compromised; even more damaging, this loss of sensitive information may never be detected. The procedural safeguards placed on physical security, covering every phase of their existence from creation through disposition, are designed to reduce or eliminate the possibility of such compromise.

Communications Security (COMSEC) is the general term used for all steps taken to protect information of value when it is being communicated. COMSEC is usually considered to have four main components: Transmission security, physical security, emission security, and cryptographic security. Transmission security is that component of COMSEC which is designed to protect transmissions from unauthorized intercept, traffic analysis, imitative deception and disruption. Physical security is that component of COMSEC, which results from all physical measures to safeguard cryptographic materials, information, documents, and equipment from access by unauthorized persons. Emission security is that component of COMSEC which results from all measures taken to prevent compromising emanations from cryptographic equipment or telecommunications systems. Finally, cryptographic security is that component of COMSEC which results from the use of technically sound cryptosystems, and from their proper use. To ensure that telecommunications are secure, all four of these components must be considered.

Part of the physical security protection given to COMSEC equipment and materials is afforded by the special handling it receives from distribution and accounting. There are two separate channels used for handling of such equipment and materials: "COMSEC channels" and "administrative channels". The COMSEC channel, called the COMSEC Material Control System (CMCS) is used to distribute accountable COMSEC items such as keying material, maintenance manuals, and classified and CCI equipment. (EXCEPTION: Some military departments have been authorized to distribute CCI equipment through their standard logistics system.) The CMCS channel is comprised of a series of COMSEC accounts, each of which has an appointed COMSEC Custodian who is personally responsible and accountable for all COMSEC material charged to the account. The COMSEC Custodian assumes responsibility for the material upon receipt, and then controls its dissemination to authorized individuals on a need-to-know basis. The administrative channel is used to distribute COMSEC information and material other than that which is accountable in the CMCS.

COMSEC ACCESS BRIEFING (cont'd)

Particularly important to the protection of COMSEC equipment and material are an understanding of all security regulations and the timely reporting of any compromise, suspected compromise, or other security problem involving these materials. If a COMSEC system is compromised but the compromise is not reported, the continued use of the system, under the incorrect assumption that it is secure, can result in the loss of all information that was ever protected by that system. If the compromise is reported, steps can be taken to change the system, replace the keying material, etc. to reduce the damage done. In short, it is your individual responsibility to know and to put into practice all the provisions of the appropriate publications, which relate to the protection of the COMSEC equipment and material to which you will have access.

Public disclosure of any COMSEC information is not permitted without the specific approval of your Government contracting office representative or the National Security Agency (NSA). This applies to both classified and unclassified COMSEC information, and means that you may not prepare newspaper articles, speeches, technical papers, or make any other "release" of COMSEC information without the specific Government approval. The best personal policy is to avoid any discussions, which reveal your knowledge of, or access to COMSEC information and thus avoid making yourself of interest to those who would seek the information you possess.

Finally, you must know that should you willfully disclose or give to any unauthorized persons any of the classified or CCI COMSEC equipment, associated keying material, or other classified COMSEC information to which you have access, you will be subjected to prosecution under the criminal laws of the United States. The laws, which apply, are contained in Title 18, United States Code, and sections 641, 793, 794, 798, and 952.

If your duties include access to classified COMSEC information, in addition to the above, you should avoid travel to any countries which are adversaries of the United States, or to their establishments/facilities within the U.S. Should such travel become necessary, however, your security office must be notified sufficiently in advance so that you may receive a defense security briefing. Any attempt to elicit the classified COMSEC information you have, either through friendship, favors, or coercion must be reported immediately to your security office.

COMSEC ACCESS CERTIFICATION

I understand that as result of performing my duties as Primary/Alternate COMSEC Representative, I am being granted access to United States cryptographic information. I understand that my being granted access to this information involves me in this position of special trust and confidence concerning matters of national security. I hereby acknowledge that I have been briefed concerning my obligations with respect to such access.

I understand that safeguarding United States Cryptographic information is of the utmost importance and that the loss or compromise could cause serious or exceptionally grave damage to the national security of the United States. I understand that I am obligated to protect U. S. cryptographic information and I have been instructed in the special nature of this information and the reasons for the protection of such information. I agree to comply with any special instructions issued by my department or office regarding unofficial foreign travel or contracts with foreign nationals.

I understand fully the information presented in the written briefing I have received. I have read this certificate and my questions if any, have been satisfactorily answered. I understand that, if I willfully disclose to any unauthorized person any of the U. S. cryptographic information to which I might have access, I may be subject to prosecution under the criminal laws of the United States, as appropriate. I understand and accept that unless I am released in writing by an authorized representative of my department or office, the terms of this certificate and my obligation to protect U. S. cryptographic information to which I have access, apply during the time of my access and at all time thereafter.

JCON-S User Account Application

The User Account Application consists of two forms: 1) JCON-S Network User Agreement Form and 2) The COMSEC Access Certification Form. Each form consists of pertinent information and a signature block. Please be sure to fully complete, sign, and obtain approval (if necessary). All forms must be completely filled out, originally signed and returned to your component point of contact (POC) before system access will be granted.

Please note that if sections of the forms are not completed they will be returned to the component POC.

JCON - S Network User Agreement Form

This check-in brief outlines basic computer or automated information system (AIS) security practices that shall be followed while utilizing JCON - S System workstations processing Collateral Secret Information. Users requesting access to the AIS, shall:

1. Read pages 7-11 of this package. Initial the bottom of each page.
2. Fill out, sign, and date the JCON - S User Agreement Form, COMSEC Form and CSAT Form.
3. Have your Supervisor fill out, sign and date his/her section of the JCON - S User Agreement Form. Please be sure to fill in the reason you need system access.
4. Keep pages 1-5 for your reference.
5. Send the originally signed package to your Component Point of Contact for processing.

Basic User Responsibilities are discussed below. More detailed information is available in the Department of Justice SPOM and individual JCON-S SOPs.

USER RESPONSIBILITIES

AIS Security Officials	The Information System Security Manager (ISSO) is responsible for establishing and enforcing AIS security policy for the JCON-S system. The system ISSO implements AIS security policy and procedures on individual workstations. Each user shall know how to contact the security officials for the information system that he/she is authorized to access.
User Access	Each user will protect the confidentiality, integrity and availability of the JCON-S system and the information it contains. Users will not employ JCON-S assets for private or personal use. JCON-S users will not attempt to have multiple concurrent active sessions.
Physical Security	Physical security and environmental controls will be used to provide an acceptable level of security to all information systems. Physical security can be achieved through basic measures such as challenging strangers/unknown personnel in your workplace or computer area and by never leaving an active terminal unattended. In temporary classified workspaces the cubicle or office should be prepared for classified processing. Preparation activities include ensuring that the computer monitor is not facing the entrance ways or windows or that the monitor has a privacy filter covering the screen, glass doors are covered with paper, and a notification sign is posted on the outside of the door. The removable hard drive and Crypto Ignition Key (CIK) may be retrieved from the safe. The safe must then be closed and secured. The cubicle or office door has been locked the session may begin. At the end of a session the printer and computer must be shut down and powered off for at least 10 seconds. Secure everything (hard drive, CIK key and all classified materials) in the GSA-approved safe except the key to the hard drive. As an added precaution (layered defense) the key to the hard drive should not be stored in the same location as the hard drive. These are important practices that safeguard against unauthorized use. Individuals providing escort duty are responsible for ensuring the person being escorted does not gain unauthorized access to a JCON - S automated information system. Failure to do so may result in a security incident and adverse action
System Monitoring	Users activities on the JCON-S system may be monitored by the Department of Justice and by DISA. JCON-S users have no expectation of privacy while using the system.

Passwords	Every user of a JCON - S system will use a "strong" password of twelve ALPHANUMERIC CHARACTERS (combination of numbers and letters). A "strong" password must contain all four types of characters: upper case letter, lower case letter, western Arabic numeric and non-alphanumeric. To prevent passwords from being easily guessed, they shall not be names/numbers that can easily be associated with your person (i.e. well known nicknames, spouse's or close relatives (son, daughter, mother, etc.) name, favorite sports teams, type of car you drive, etc.) nor should they be dictionary words (e.g. "SPIDER" or "OFFICE"). Choose a password that is easy for you to remember but is not easily guessed. Passwords are for individual use only. The sharing of passwords is prohibited as is writing it down in easily accessible places (such as "post-it" notes on your desk or in your organizer file under "P", etc.). Your password is used to authenticate you and only you as a valid user of the system. Protect passwords, when combined with user account names, at the highest classification level of the system to which the passwords allow access. If you feel your password has been compromised or that unauthorized personnel are accessing your files, report it immediately to the system ISSO.
Individual Account Protection	To ensure individual account and system protection log-off the system each time you leave the workstation. Ensure this is always done! Failure to secure the workstation by logging off is a practice dangerous to security and may result in adverse administrative action.
Processing Restrictions	Information systems connected to the JCON - S LAN can process, store, and transmit information up to a classification level of SECRET. If higher classification is inadvertently processed on the JCON - S LAN, report the incident immediately to the ISSO and his/her Security Program Manager (SPM). The contaminated workstation(s) and servers will be disconnected from the network and sanitized. Users will not forward E-mails automatically outside the JCON-S system. The JCON-S network is a closed network, except for the SIPRNet connection. Users will not attempt to connect any JCON-S assets or resources to any other system.
Hardware	JCON-S users will not introduce new hardware to the JCON-S workstation or workstation suite. The use of modems, wireless adapters, or USB devices on JCON-S. is strictly prohibited.
Software	Requests to use non-standard JCON - S software, including free and unsolicited demonstration software, shall be submitted to the JCON - S ISSO. Personally owned software, regardless of source, may not be introduced into JCON - S computers.
Removable Media	All removable magnetic media must bear a label indicating the classification level of information to which the media contains. A color-coded security classification label must be affixed to media. Place the labels in a conspicuous place where they will not adversely affect operation of the equipment. Media may not be moved from the JCON-S workstation suite to an unclassified system.

	JCON-S users will protect media that has been used on JCON-S at the SECRET Level, even if they believe the media contains only unclassified information. Users will dispose of medial when it is no longer required for mission completion.
Output	Users will ensure that all output contains proper classification and control markings and is adequately protected, including classified information cover sheets. This includes all messages and correspondence generated on electronic mail systems. Printed Secret information that does not leave the restricted area is normally exempt from accountability. See the ISSO with questions regarding printed collateral Secret material.
Electronic Mail	E-mail is a DOJ owned communications system used to supplement the record message system. It is subject to the same for official use only constraints as government mail or telephones, and shall be used to conduct Government business only. Users should be aware that administrators and technicians have the ability to review e-mail and disseminate it as necessary. There is no expectation of privacy while using DOJ information systems!
Electronic Equipment	Items generally prohibited in restricted areas include personally owned: photographic, video, audio recording equipment, computers & associated media, and cell phones. Personally owned electronic calculators, electronic spell-checkers, wristwatches, receive only pagers and radios are allowed in a Restricted Area.
Virus/Malicious Programs	Users shall make every effort to prevent the transmission of computer viruses and Trojan horses. Anti-virus software is installed on all JCON - S workstations. Users will use the installed anti-viral software to scan any removable media introduced to the JCON-S system prior to its being accessed by other JCON-S resources.
Disposal and Output media.	JCON S users will dispose of classified material properly. Disposal methods may in clued burning, shredding, pulping, melting, mutilating, using chemical decomposition, pulverizing, or degaussing. Users will properly dispose of toner cartridges.

To begin using the classified system:

1. Make sure the hard drive key is accessible.

Note: Some workstations may not have removable hard drives. If working on a machine without a hard drive please disregard the steps referring to the removable hard drives.

2. Clear work area of all unauthorized personnel.

3. Review System Security Plan.

4. Do not leave classified material unattended or unsecured during processing.

5. Retrieve removable hard drive and Crypto Ignition Key (CIK) from GSA-approved container.

6. Insert and lock the hard drive.

7. Turn the computer on.

8. Insert the CIK into the TACLANE and turn the key $1/8^{th}$ of a turn in the clockwise direction.

9. Turn the TACLANE on and use the following procedure to establish a secure connection.
   - After the start up process runs the "-----Offline Main Menu-----" should appear.
   - Use the arrows on the key pad to move the selection cursor '>' to the "Operation" option and press the select button.
   - Use the arrows to select the "Select Lvl" option and press the Select button.
   - Use the arrows to select "Secret" as the level and press the Select button.
   - Select "Operation" and press the Select button.
   - Select "Secure Comm" and press the Select button. Note: The Green Run light blinks when Secure Comm mode is functioning properly.

10. Upon completion of the computer boot-up, Log on, and initiate desired program.

11. If storage media is needed ensure that it is properly labeled and insert it into its drive.

12. If system malfunctions, immediately notify the TSVC Help Desk at 202-307-5368.

13. If you need to print, use only the locally associated printer. (Network printing is not allowed.)

14. Ensure all printer material is properly labeled with highest level of classification contained therein.

15. Do not load any unauthorized software on system.

To shut down the system:

Note: Some workstations may not have removable hard drives. If working on a machine without a hard drive please disregard the steps referring to the removable hard drives.

1. Save any material to the A: drive or the removable hard drive.

2. Remove any diskettes in the A: drive or CDs, label them with appropriate classification and set aside for storage in the GSA-approved container.

3. Shut down the computer. Note: A logoff script will run when the computer is shutting down. Depending upon the type of printer (inkjet or laser) the printer may print 3 sheets of paper to clear the memory and clean the drum.

4. Turn off the printer.

5. Shut down the TACLANE using the following procedures.
   - Select "Operations" and press the Select button.
   - Select the "Shutdown" and press the Select button.
   - The prompt "Perform Shutdown?" will appear.
   - Select "Yes". – Wait a moment until the TACLANE states you may shut the TACLANE off.
   - Turn off the TACLANE.
   - Turn the CIK key 1/8th of a turn in the counter clockwise direction and remove the CIK.

6. Remove the hard drive from the workstation.

7. Ensure all products/media are properly marked.

8. Place all classified media (hard drive and the CIK key) into the GSA-approved security container.

9. Store the hard drive key.

Part 2	USER AUTHORIZATION & ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

Scope of Authorization

Subject to the limitations detailed in the User Responsibilities of this brief and the respective system Standard Operating Procedures (SOP), the user is authorized access to JCON - S information systems classified Secret as required. This authorization contains no implied authorization to access any computer system of the United States Government not specifically identified herein. This authorization shall be revoked upon separation, retirement, reassignment of duties, change of organization or when determined by the Information Systems Security Officer (ISSO) to be in the best interest of the Government.

WARNING: Only Authorized Users May Use These Systems. Individuals using DOJ computer systems without authority, or in excess of their authority, are subject to having all of their activities on these systems monitored and recorded by system personnel. In the course of monitoring individuals improperly using these systems, or in the course of system maintenance, the activities of authorized users may be monitored. Anyone using these systems expressly consents to such monitoring and is advised that if such monitoring reveals possible evidence of criminal activity, management may authorize system personnel to provide the evidence of such monitoring to law enforcement officials.

I understand that I am authorized to access to Department of Justice computer systems as necessary. Access for purposes beyond the Scope of Authorization is a violation of Federal law (18 U.S.C. 1030 et al.). I acknowledge the above briefing along with my responsibility to protect information processed by the Department of Justice owned and operated computer systems, directly or via remote access. I understand that only official Department of Justice business may be conducted on the system. Any records produced are government records and must be handled in accordance with the Paperwork Management and Information Security Manuals.

I understand THERE IS NO EXPECTATION OF PRIVACY WHILE USING THIS CLASSIFIED DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE SYSTEM and that ALL DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE SYSTEMS ARE SUBJECT TO MONITORING BY AUTHORIZED PERSONNEL. I further understand that if security monitoring reveals evidence of possible improper or criminal activity, such evidence will be provided to appropriate management and/or law enforcement personnel and may result in prosecution and/or removal of my account.

I have read and initialed the user responsibilities pages attached to this form and retained a copy for my reference. I agree to abide by the applicable system SOP.

JCON - S Network User Agreement Form

This check-in brief outlines basic computer or automated information system (AIS) security practices that shall be followed while utilizing JCON - S System workstations processing Collateral Secret Information. Users requesting access to the AIS, shall:

1. Read pages 7-11 of this package. Initial the bottom of each page.
2. Fill out, sign, and date the JCON - S User Agreement Form.
3. Have your Supervisor fill out, sign and date his/her section of the JCON - S User Agreement Form. Please be sure to fill in the reason you need system access.
4. Keep pages 1-5 for your reference.
5. Send the originally signed package to your Component Point of Contact for processing.

Basic User Responsibilities are discussed below. More detailed information is available in the Department of Justice SPOM and individual JCON-S SOPs.

USER RESPONSIBILITIES

AIS Security Officials	The Information System Security Manager (ISSO) is responsible for establishing and enforcing AIS security policy for the JCON - S system. The system ISSO implements AIS security policy and procedures on individual workstations. Each user shall know how to contact the security officials for the information system that he/she is authorized to access.
User Access	Each user will protect the confidentiality, integrity and availability of the JCON-S system and the information it contains. Users will not employ JCON-S assets for private or personal use. JCON-S users will not attempt to have multiple concurrent active sessions.
Physical Security	Physical security and environmental controls will be used to provide an acceptable level of security to all information systems. Physical security can be achieved through basic measures such as challenging strangers/unknown personnel in your workplace or computer area and by never leaving an active terminal unattended. In temporary classified workspaces the cubicle or office should be prepared for classified processing. Preparation activities include ensuring that the computer monitor is not facing the entrance ways or windows or that the monitor has a privacy filter covering the screen, glass doors are covered with paper, and a notification sign is posted on the outside of the door. The removable hard drive and Crypto Ignition Key (CIK) may be retrieved from the safe. The safe must then be closed and secured. The cubicle or office door has been locked the session may begin. At the end of a session the printer and computer must be shut down and powered off for at least 10 seconds. Secure everything (hard drive, CIK key and all classified materials) in the GSA-approved safe except the key to the hard drive. As an added precaution (layered defense) the key to the hard drive should not be stored in the same location as the hard drive. These are important practices that safeguard against unauthorized use. Individuals providing escort duty are responsible for ensuring the person being escorted does not gain unauthorized access to a JCON - S automated information system. Failure to do so may result in a security incident and adverse action
System Monitoring	Users activities on the JCON-S system may be monitored by the Department of Justice and by DISA. JCON-S users have no expectation of privacy while using the system.

Passwords	Every user of a JCON - S system will use a "strong" password of twelve ALPHANUMERIC CHARACTERS (combination of numbers and letters). A "strong" password must contain all four types of characters: upper case letter, lower case letter, western Arabic numeric and non-alphanumeric. To prevent passwords from being easily guessed, they shall not be names/numbers that can easily be associated with your person (i.e. well known nicknames, spouse's or close relatives (son, daughter, mother, etc.) name, favorite sports teams, type of car you drive, etc.) nor should they be dictionary words (e.g. "SPIDER" or "OFFICE"). Choose a password that is easy for you to remember but is not easily guessed. Passwords are for individual use only. The sharing of passwords is prohibited as is writing it down in easily accessible places (such as "post-it" notes on your desk or in your organizer file under "P", etc.). Your password is used to authenticate you and only you as a valid user of the system. Protect passwords, when combined with user account names, at the highest classification level of the system to which the passwords allow access. If you feel your password has been compromised or that unauthorized personnel are accessing your files, report it immediately to the system ISSO.
Individual Account Protection	To ensure individual account and system protection log-off the system each time you leave the workstation. Ensure this is always done! Failure to secure the workstation by logging off is a practice dangerous to security and may result in adverse administrative action.
Processing Restrictions	Information systems connected to the JCON - S LAN can process, store, and transmit information up to a classification level of SECRET. If higher classification is inadvertently processed on the JCON - S LAN, report the incident immediately to the ISSO and his/her Security Program Manager (SPM). The contaminated workstation(s) and servers will be disconnected from the network and sanitized. Users will not forward E-mails automatically outside the JCON-S system. The JCON-S network is a closed network, except for the SIPRNet connection. Users will not attempt to connect any JCON-S assets or resources to any other system.
Hardware	JCON-S users will not introduce new hardware to the JCON-S workstation or workstation suite. The use of modems, wireless adapters, or USB devices on JCON-S. is strictly prohibited.
Software	Requests to use non-standard JCON - S software, including free and unsolicited demonstration software, shall be submitted to the JCON - S ISSO. Personally owned software, regardless of source, may not be introduced into JCON - S computers.
Removable Media	All removable magnetic media must bear a label indicating the classification level of information to which the media contains. A color-coded security classification label must be affixed to media. Place the labels in a conspicuous place where they will not adversely affect operation of the equipment. Media may not be moved from the JCON-S workstation suite to an unclassified system. JCON-S users will protect media that has been used on JCON-S at the SECRET

	Level, even if they believe the media contains only unclassified information. Users will dispose of medial when it is no longer required for mission completion.
Output	Users will ensure that all output contains proper classification and control markings and is adequately protected, including classified information cover sheets. This includes all messages and correspondence generated on electronic mail systems. Printed Secret information that does not leave the restricted area is normally exempt from accountability. See the ISSO with questions regarding printed collateral Secret material.
Electronic Mail	E-mail is a DOJ owned communications system used to supplement the record message system. It is subject to the same for official use only constraints as government mail or telephones, and shall be used to conduct Government business only. Users should be aware that administrators and technicians have the ability to review e-mail and disseminate it as necessary. There is no expectation of privacy while using DOJ information systems!
Electronic Equipment	Items generally prohibited in restricted areas include personally owned: photographic, video, audio recording equipment, computers & associated media, and cell phones. Personally owned electronic calculators, electronic spell-checkers, wristwatches, receive only pagers and radios are allowed in a Restricted Area.
Virus/Malicious Programs	Users shall make every effort to prevent the transmission of computer viruses and Trojan horses. Anti-virus software is installed on all JCON - S workstations. Users wil use the installed anti-viral software to scan any removable media introduced to the JCON-S system prior to its being accessed by other JCON-S resources.
Disposal and Output media.	JCON S users will dispose of classified material properly. Disposal methods may in clued burning, shredding, pulping, melting, mutilating, using chemical decomposition, pulverizing, or degaussing. Users will properly dispose of toner cartridges.

To begin using the classified system:

1. Make sure the hard drive key is accessible.

Note: Some workstations may not have removable hard drives. If working on a machine without a hard drive please disregard the steps referring to the removable hard drives.

2. Clear work area of all unauthorized personnel.

3. Review System Security Plan.

4. Do not leave classified material unattended or unsecured during processing.

5. Retrieve removable hard drive and Crypto Ignition Key (CIK) from GSA-approved container.

6. Insert and lock the hard drive.

7. Turn the computer on.

8. Insert the CIK key into the TACLANE and turn the key $1/8^{th}$ of a turn in the clockwise direction.

9. Turn the TACLANE on and use the following procedure to establish a secure connection.
   - After the start up process runs the "-----Offline Main Menu-----" should appear.
   - Use the arrows on the key pad to move the selection cursor '>' to the "Operation" option and press the select button.
   - Use the arrows to select the "Select Lvl" option and press the Select button.
   - Use the arrows to select "Secret" as the level and press the Select button.
   - Select "Operation" and press the Select button.
   - Select "Secure Comm" and press the Select button. Note: The Green Run light blinks when Secure Comm mode is functioning properly.

10. Upon completion of the computer boot-up, Log on, and initiate desired program.

11. If storage media is needed ensure that it is properly labeled and insert it into its drive.

12. If system malfunctions, immediately notify the TSVC Help Desk at 202-307-5368.

13. If you need to print, use only the locally associated printer. (Network printing is not allowed.)

14. Ensure all printer material is properly labeled with highest level of classification contained therein.

15. Do not load any unauthorized software on system.

To shut down the system:

1. Save any material to the A: drive or the removable hard drive.
Note: Some workstations may not have removable hard drives. If working on a machine without a hard drive please disregard the steps referring to the removable hard drives.

2. Remove any diskettes in the A: drive or CDs, label them with appropriate classification and set aside for storage in the GSA-approved container.

3. Shut down the computer. Note: A logoff script will run when the computer is shutting down. Depending upon the type of printer (inkjet or laser) the printer may print 3 sheets of paper to clear the memory and clean the drum.

4. Turn off the printer.

5. Shut down the TACLANE using the following procedures.
   - Select "Operations" and press the Select button.
   - Select the "Shutdown" and press the Select button.
   - The prompt "Perform Shutdown?" will appear.
   - Select "Yes". – Wait a moment until the TACLANE states you may shut the TACLANE off.
   - Turn off the TACLANE.
   - Turn the CIK key 1/8th of a turn in the counter clockwise direction and remove the CIK.

6. Remove the hard drive from the workstation.

7. Ensure all products/media are properly marked.

8. Place all classified media (hard drive and the CIK key) into the GSA-approved security container.

9. Store the hard drive key.

JCON-TS (JWICS) User Agreement Form

The User Account Application consists of two forms: 1) JCON-TS User Agreement Form and 2) The COMSEC Access Certification Form. Each form consists of pertinent information and a signature block. Please be sure to fully complete, sign, and obtain approval (if necessary). All forms must be completely filled out, originally signed and returned to your component point of contact (POC) before system access will be granted.

Please note that if sections of the forms are not completed they will be returned to the component POC.

JCON-TS (JWICS) User Agreement Form

This check-in brief outlines basic computer or automated information system (AIS) security practices that shall be followed while utilizing DOJ JWICS System workstations processing Top Secret / SCI Information. Users requesting access to the AIS, shall:

1. Read pages 5-7 of this package. Initial the bottom of each page.
2. Fill out, sign, and date the DOJ JWICS User Agreement Form.
3. Have your Supervisor fill out, sign and date his/her section of the DOJ JWICS User Agreement Form.
4. Keep pages 1-3 for your reference.
5. Send the package to the system Information System Security Officer (ISSO) for processing.

Basic User Responsibilities are discussed below. More detailed information is available in the SPOM and individual system SOPs.

USER RESPONSIBILITIES

AIS Security Officials	The Information System Security Manager (ISSO) is responsible for establishing and enforcing AIS security policy for the DOJ JWICS system. The system ISSO implements AIS security policy and procedures on individual workstations. Each user shall know how to contact the security officials for the information system that he/she is authorized to access. The ISSO is Dale Long and he can be reached at 202-353-9856.
Passwords	Every user of a DOJ JWICS system will use a "strong" password of eight ALPHANUMERIC CHARACTERS (combination of numbers and letters). A "strong" password must contain all four types of characters: upper case letter, lower case letter, western Arabic numeric and non-alphanumeric. To prevent passwords from being easily guessed, they shall not be names/numbers that can easily be associated with your person (i.e. well known nicknames, spouse's or close relatives (son, daughter, mother, etc.) name, favorite sports teams, type of car you drive, etc.) nor should they be dictionary words (e.g. "SPIDER" or "OFFICE"). Choose a password that is easy for you to remember but is not easily guessed. Passwords are for individual use only. The sharing of passwords is prohibited as is writing it down in easily accessible places (such as "post-it" notes on your desk or in your organizer file under "P", etc.). Your password is used to authenticate you and only you as a valid user of the system. Protect passwords, when combined with user account names, at the highest classification level of the system to which the passwords allow access. If you feel your password has been compromised or that unauthorized personnel are accessing your files, report it immediately to the system ISSO.
Physical Security	Physical security and environmental controls shall be used to provide an acceptable level of security to all information systems. Physical security can be achieved through basic measures such as challenging strangers/unknown personnel in your workplace or computer area and by never leaving an active terminal unattended. At the end of a session the printer and computer must be shut down and powered off for at least 10 seconds. These are important practices that safeguard against unauthorized use. Failure to do so may result in a security incident and adverse action
Individual Account Protection	To ensure individual account and system protection log-off the system each time you leave the workstation. Users are required to logoff when departing for the day. Ensure this is always done! Failure to secure the workstation by logging off is a practice dangerous to security and may result in adverse administrative action.

JCON-TS (JWICS) User Agreement Form

Processing Restrictions	Information systems connected to the DOJ JWICS LAN can process, store, and transmit information up to a classification level of Top Secret/ SCI. If higher classification is inadvertently processed on the DOJ JWICS LAN, report the incident immediately to the ISSO. The contaminated workstation(s) and servers will be disconnected from the network and sanitized.
Software	Requests to use non-standard DOJ JWICS software, including free and unsolicited demonstration software, shall be submitted to the DOJ JWICS ISSO. Personally owned software, regardless of source, may not be introduced into DOJ JWICS computers.
Modems	The use of modems is prohibited.
Wireless adapters	The use of wireless adapters are prohibited.
Removable Media	All removable magnetic media must bear a label indicating the classification level of information to which the media contains. A color-coded security classification label must be affixed to media. Place the labels in a conspicuous place where they will not adversely affect operation of the equipment. For destruction, return removable media to the system ISSO.
Output	Users will ensure that all output contains proper classification and control markings and is adequately protected, including classified information cover sheets. This includes all messages and correspondence generated on electronic mail systems. Printed Top Secret information that does not leave the restricted area is normally exempt from accountability. See the ISSO with questions regarding printed collateral Top Secret material.
Toner Cartridges	Return used toner cartridges from classified laser printers and secure fax to the system ISSO for recycling or disposal. Generally, used toners from classified systems, that have successfully completed a printing cycle, are considered unclassified.
Copying Files	Users are not authorized to move files between systems with differing classifications unless designated in writing by the ISSO. When a user has a requirement to copy or move files between systems with differing classifications, the user shall contact the system ISSO for assistance. The ISSO has software utilities and procedures to comply with secure copy policy.
Electronic Mail	E-Mail is a DOJ owned communications system used to supplement the record message system. It is subject to the same for official use only constraints as government mail or telephones, and shall be used to conduct Government business only. Users should be aware that administrators and technicians have the ability to review e-mail and disseminate it as necessary. There is no expectation of privacy while using DOJ information systems!
Electronic Equipment	Items generally prohibited in restricted areas include personally owned: photographic, video, audio recording equipment, computers & associated media, and cell phones. Personally owned electronic calculators, electronic spell-checkers, wristwatches, receive only pagers and radios are allowed in a Restricted Area.
Virus/Malicious Programs	Users shall make very effort to prevent the transmission of computer viruses and Trojan horses. Anti-virus software is installed on all DOJ JWICS workstations. Any removable media introduced from outside DOJ shall be inspected by the ISSO prior to being placed into a DOJ JWICS workstation.

To begin using the classified system:

1. Make sure the hard drive key is accessible.

Note: The hard drive key may not be stored in the same location as the hard drive.

2. Clear work area of all unauthorized personnel.

3. Review System Security Plan.

4. Do not leave classified material unattended or unsecured during processing.

5. Upon completion of boot-up initiate desired program.

6. If storage media is needed ensure that it is properly labeled and insert it into its drive.

7. If system malfunctions, immediately notify the TSVC Help Desk at 202-307-5368.

8. If you need to print, use only the associated printer.

9. Ensure all printer material is properly labeled with highest level of classification contained therein.

10. Do not load any unauthorized software on system.

To shut down the system:

1. Save any material to the A: drive or the removable hard drive.

2. Clear printer memory and clear the paper path by turning off the printer for at least 10 seconds.

3. Remove any diskette in the A: drive, label it with appropriate classification and set aside for storage in the GSA-approved container.

4. Clear computer memory by turning off the computer for at least 10 seconds.

5. Ensure all products/media are properly marked.

6. Store the hard drive key.

Remember: The hard drive key may not be stored in the same location as the hard drive.

Individuals using DOJ computer systems without authority, or in excess of their authority, are subject to having all of their activities on these systems monitored and recorded by system personnel. In the course of monitoring individuals improperly using these systems, or in the course of system maintenance, the activities of authorized users may be monitored. Anyone using these systems expressly consents to such monitoring and is advised that if such monitoring reveals possible evidence of criminal activity, management may authorize system personnel to provide the evidence of such monitoring to law enforcement officials.

I understand that I am authorized to access to Department of Justice computer systems as necessary. Access for purposes beyond the Scope of Authorization is a violation of Federal law (18 U.S.C. 1030 et al.). I acknowledge the above briefing along with my responsibility to protect information processed by the Department of Justice owned and operated computer systems, directly or via remote access. I understand that only official Department of Justice business may be conducted on the system. Any records produced are government records and must be handled in accordance with the Paperwork Management and Information Security Manuals.

I understand THERE IS NO EXPECTATION OF PRIVACY WHILE USING THIS CLASSIFIED DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE SYSTEM and that ALL DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE SYSTEMS ARE SUBJECT TO MONITORING BY AUTHORIZED PERSONNEL. I further understand that if security monitoring reveals evidence of possible improper or criminal activity, such evidence will be provided to appropriate management and/or law enforcement personnel and may result in prosecution and/or removal of my account.

I have read and initialed the user responsibilities pages attached to this form and retained a copy for my reference. I agree to abide by the applicable system SOP.

JCON – TS (JWICS) User Agreement Form

This check-in brief outlines basic computer or automated information system (AIS) security practices that shall be followed while utilizing DOJ JWICS System workstations processing Top Secret / SCI Information. Users requesting access to the AIS, shall:

6. Read pages 5-7 of this package. Initial the bottom of each page.
7. Fill out, sign, and date the DOJ JWICS User Agreement Form.
8. Have your Supervisor fill out, sign and date his/her section of the DOJ JWICS User Agreement Form.
9. Keep pages 1-3 for your reference.
10. Send the package to the system Information System Security Officer (ISSO) for processing.

Basic User Responsibilities are discussed below. More detailed information is available in the SPOM and individual system SOPs.

USER RESPONSIBILITIES

AIS Security Officials	The Information System Security Manager (ISSO) is responsible for establishing and enforcing AIS security policy for the DOJ JWICS system. The system ISSO implements AIS security policy and procedures on individual workstations. Each user shall know how to contact the security officials for the information system that he/she is authorized to access. The ISSO is Dale Long and he can be reached at 202-353-9856.
Passwords	Every user of a DOJ JWICS system will use a "strong" password of eight ALPHANUMERIC CHARACTERS (combination of numbers and letters). A "strong" password must contain all four types of characters: upper case letter, lower case letter, western Arabic numeric and non-alphanumeric. To prevent passwords from being easily guessed, they shall not be names/numbers that can easily be associated with your person (i.e. well known nicknames, spouse's or close relatives (son, daughter, mother, etc.) name, favorite sports teams, type of car you drive, etc.) nor should they be dictionary words (e.g. "SPIDER" or "OFFICE"). Choose a password that is easy for you to remember but is not easily guessed. Passwords are for individual use only. The sharing of passwords is prohibited as is writing it down in easily accessible places (such as "post-it" notes on your desk or in your organizer file under "P", etc.). Your password is used to authenticate you and only you as a valid user of the system. Protect passwords, when combined with user account names, at the highest classification level of the system to which the passwords allow access. If you feel your password has been compromised or that unauthorized personnel are accessing your files, report it immediately to the system ISSO.
Physical Security	Physical security and environmental controls shall be used to provide an acceptable level of security to all information systems. Physical security can be achieved through basic measures such as challenging strangers/unknown personnel in your workplace or computer area and by never leaving an active terminal unattended. At the end of a session the printer and computer must be shut down and powered off for at least 10 seconds. These are important practices that safeguard against unauthorized use. Individuals providing escort duty are responsible for ensuring the person being escorted does not gain unauthorized access to a DOJ JWICS automated information system. Failure to do so may result in a security incident and adverse action
Individual Account Protection	To ensure individual account and system protection log-off the system each time you leave the workstation. Users are required to logoff when departing for the day. Ensure this is always done! Failure to secure the workstation by logging off is a practice dangerous to security and may result in adverse administrative action.
Processing	Information systems connected to the DOJ JWICS LAN can process, store, and transmit information

Restrictions	up to a classification level of Top Secret/ SCI. If higher classification is inadvertently processed on the DOJ JWICS LAN, report the incident immediately to the ISSO. The contaminated workstation(s) and servers will be disconnected from the network and sanitized.
Software	Requests to use non-standard DOJ JWICS software, including free and unsolicited demonstration software, shall be submitted to the DOJ JWICS ISSO. Personally owned software, regardless of source, may not be introduced into DOJ JWICS computers.
Modems	The use of modems is prohibited.
Wireless adapters	The use of wireless adapters are prohibited.
Removable Media	All removable magnetic media must bear a label indicating the classification level of information to which the media contains. A color-coded security classification label must be affixed to media. Place the labels in a conspicuous place where they will not adversely affect operation of the equipment. For destruction, return removable media to the system ISSO.
Output	Users will ensure that all output contains proper classification and control markings and is adequately protected, including classified information cover sheets. This includes all messages and correspondence generated on electronic mail systems. Printed Top Secret information that does not leave the restricted area is normally exempt from accountability. See the ISSO with questions regarding printed collateral Top Secret material.
Toner Cartridges	Return used toner cartridges from classified laser printers and secure fax to the system ISSO for recycling or disposal. Generally, used toners from classified systems, that have successfully completed a printing cycle, are considered unclassified.
Copying Files	Users are not authorized to move files between systems with differing classifications unless designated in writing by the ISSO. When a user has a requirement to copy or move files between systems with differing classifications, the user shall contact the system ISSO for assistance. The ISSO has software utilities and procedures to comply with secure copy policy.
Electronic Mail	E-Mail is a DOJ owned communications system used to supplement the record message system. It is subject to the same for official use only constraints as government mail or telephones, and shall be used to conduct Government business only. Users should be aware that administrators and technicians have the ability to review e-mail and disseminate it as necessary. There is no expectation of privacy while using DOJ information systems!
Electronic Equipment	Items generally prohibited in restricted areas include personally owned: photographic, video, audio recording equipment, computers & associated media, and cell phones. Personally owned electronic calculators, electronic spell-checkers, wristwatches, receive only pagers and radios are allowed in a Restricted Area.
Virus/Malicious Programs	Users shall make very effort to prevent the transmission of computer viruses and Trojan horses. Anti-virus software is installed on all DOJ JWICS workstations. Any removable media introduced from outside DOJ shall be inspected by the ISSO prior to being placed into a DOJ JWICS workstation.

To begin using the classified system:

1. Make sure the hard drive key is accessible.

Note: The hard drive key may not be stored in the same location as the hard drive.

2. Clear work area of all unauthorized personnel.

3. Review System Security Plan.

4. Do not leave classified material unattended or unsecured during processing.

5. Upon completion of boot-up initiate desired program.

6. If storage media is needed ensure that it is properly labeled and insert it into its drive.

7. If system malfunctions, immediately notify the TSVC Help Desk at 202-307-5368.

8. If you need to print, use only the associated printer.

9. Ensure all printer material is properly labeled with highest level of classification contained therein.

10. Do not load any unauthorized software on system.

To shut down the system:

1. Save any material to the A: drive or the removable hard drive.

2. Clear printer memory and clear the paper path by turning off the printer for at least 10 seconds.

3. Remove any diskette in the A: drive, label it with appropriate classification and set aside for storage in the GSA-approved container.

4. Clear computer memory by turning off the computer for at least 10 seconds.

5. Ensure all products/media are properly marked.

6. Store the hard drive key.

Remember: The hard drive key may not be stored in the same location as the hard drive.

COMSEC ACCESS BRIEFING

You have been selected to perform duties requiring access to sensitive COMSEC information. It is, therefore, essential that you are made fully aware of certain facts relative to the protection of this information before access is granted. This briefing will provide you with a description of the types of COMSEC information you may have access to, the reasons why special safeguards are necessary for protecting this information, the directives and rules, which prescribe those safeguards, and the penalties that you will incur for willful disclosure of this information to unauthorized persons.

COMSEC equipment and keying material are especially sensitive because they are used to protect other sensitive information against unauthorized access during the process of communicating that information from one point to another. Any particular piece of COMSEC equipment, keying material, or other cryptographic material may be the critical element, which protects large amounts of sensitive information from interception, analysis, and exploitation. If the integrity of the COMSEC system is weakened at any point, all the sensitive information protected by that system might be compromised; even more damaging, this loss of sensitive information may never be detected. The procedural safeguards placed on physical security, covering every phase of their existence from creation through disposition, are designed to reduce or eliminate the possibility of such compromise.

Communications Security (COMSEC) is the general term used for all steps taken to protect information of value when it is being communicated. COMSEC is usually considered to have four main components: Transmission security, physical security, emission security, and cryptographic security. Transmission security is that component of COMSEC which is designed to protect transmissions from unauthorized intercept, traffic analysis, imitative deception and disruption. Physical security is that component of COMSEC, which results from all physical measures to safeguard cryptographic materials, information, documents, and equipment from access by unauthorized persons. Emission security is that component of COMSEC which results from all measures taken to prevent compromising emanations from cryptographic equipment or telecommunications systems. Finally, cryptographic security is that component of COMSEC which results from the use of technically sound cryptosystems, and from their proper use. To ensure that telecommunications are secure, all four of these components must be considered.

Part of the physical security protection given to COMSEC equipment and materials is afforded by the special handling it receives from distribution and accounting. There are two separate channels used for handling of such equipment and materials: "COMSEC channels" and "administrative channels". The COMSEC channel, called the COMSEC Material Control System (CMCS) is used to distribute accountable COMSEC items such as keying material, maintenance manuals, and classified and CCI equipment. (EXCEPTION: Some military departments have been authorized to distribute CCI equipment through their standard logistics system.) The CMCS channel is comprised of a series of COMSEC accounts, each of which has an appointed COMSEC Custodian who is personally responsible and accountable for all COMSEC material charged to the account. The COMSEC Custodian assumes responsibility for the material upon receipt, and then controls its dissemination to authorized individuals on a need-to-know basis. The administrative channel is used to distribute COMSEC information and material other than that which is accountable in the CMCS.

JCON-TS (JWICS) User Agreement

Particularly important to the protection of COMSEC equipment and material are an understanding of all security regulations and the timely reporting of any compromise, suspected compromise, or other security problem involving these materials. If a COMSEC system is compromised but the compromise is not reported, the continued use of the system, under the incorrect assumption that it is secure, can result in the loss of all information that was ever protected by that system. If the compromise is reported, steps can be taken to change the system, replace the keying material, etc. to reduce the damage done. In short, it is your individual responsibility to know and to put into practice all the provisions of the appropriate publications, which relate to the protection of the COMSEC equipment and material to which you will have access.

Public disclosure of any COMSEC information is not permitted without the specific approval of your Government contracting office representative or the National Security Agency (NSA). This applies to both classified and unclassified COMSEC information, and means that you may not prepare newspaper articles, speeches, technical papers, or make any other "release" of COMSEC information without the specific Government approval. The best personal policy is to avoid any discussions, which reveal your knowledge of, or access to COMSEC information and thus avoid making yourself of interest to those who would seek the information you possess.

Finally, you must know that should you willfully disclose or give to any unauthorized persons any of the classified or CCI COMSEC equipment, associated keying material, or other classified COMSEC information to which you have access, you will be subjected to prosecution under the criminal laws of the United States. The laws, which apply, are contained in Title 18, United States Code, and sections 641, 793, 794, 798, and 952.

If your duties include access to classified COMSEC information, in addition to the above, you should avoid travel to any countries which are adversaries of the United States, or to their establishments/facilities within the U.S. Should such travel become necessary, however, your security office must be notified sufficiently in advance so that you may receive a defense security briefing. Any attempt to elicit the classified COMSEC information you have, either through friendship, favors, or coercion must be reported immediately to your security office.

COMSEC ACCESS CERTIFICATION

I understand that as result of performing my duties as Primary/Alternate COMSEC Representative, I am being granted access to United States cryptographic information. I understand that my being granted access to this information involves me in this position of special trust and confidence concerning matters of national security. I hereby acknowledge that I have been briefed concerning my obligations with respect to such access.

I understand that safeguarding United States Cryptographic information is of the utmost importance and that the loss or compromise could cause serious or exceptionally grave damage to the national security of the United States. I understand that I am obligated to protect U. S. cryptographic information and I have been instructed in the special nature of this information and the reasons for the protection of such information. I agree to comply with any special instructions issued by my department or office regarding unofficial foreign travel or contracts with foreign nationals.

I understand fully the information presented in the written briefing I have received. I have read this certificate and my questions if any, have been satisfactorily answered. I understand that, if I willfully disclose to any unauthorized person any of the U. S. cryptographic information to which I might have access, I may be subject to prosecution under the criminal laws of the United States, as appropriate. I understand and accept that unless I am released in writing by an authorized representative of my department or office, the terms of this certificate and my obligation to protect U. S. cryptographic information to which I have access, apply during the time of my access and at all time thereafter.

Re: Juror Number 01-0060, Participant Number 100362022

To the Jury Division:

I am currently scheduled to serve beginning September 2, 2005 (this Friday). I write respectfully to request a two month deferral of my service for reasons set forth below.

I serve as Principal Deputy to the Associate Attorney General, Robert McCallum. Mr. McCallum is the Department of Justice's number three officer. Due to a resignation on August 16, Mr. McCallum has now been asked to take on the additional responsibility of serving as the Acting Deputy Attorney General, the Department's second most senior officer. This additional temporary responsibility – in effect until a new Deputy Attorney General is confirmed by the Senate – has imposed substantial new duties on our small office, and has come at a time when we are not fully staffed. Given these extraordinary and temporary circumstances, I would be very grateful for a short deferral of service so that I might assist Mr. McCallum in fulfilling his dual responsibilities. Mr. McCallum is aware of my request.

Both Mr. McCallum and I take jury service seriously and consider it a point of civic responsibility and pride. I therefore do not request this deferral lightly and apologize for any inconvenience my request may cause the Court. If you have any questions about any of the foregoing, please do not hesitate to call me; my direct dial is [redacted]

Sincerely,

Neil M. Gorsuch

Tax Check Waiver

I am signing this waiver to permit the Internal Revenue Service to release information about me which would otherwise be confidential. This information will be used in connection with my appointment or employment by the United States Government. This waiver is made pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 6103(c).

I request that the Internal Revenue Service release the following information to James L. Dunlap, Director, Security and Emergency Planning Staff, U.S. Department of Justice (or designee):

1. Have I failed to file any Federal income tax return for any of the last three years for which filing of a return might have been required? (If the filing date without regard to extensions and normal processing period for most recent year's return has not yet elapsed on the date IRS receives this waiver, and the IRS records do not indicate a return for the most recent year, the "last three years" will mean the three years preceding the year for which returns are currently being filed and processed.)

2. Were any of the returns in #1 filed more than 45 days after the due date for filing (determined with regard to any extension(s) of time for filing)?

3. Have I failed to pay any tax, penalty or interest during the current or last three calendar years within 45 days of the date on which the IRS gave notice of the amount due and requested payment?

4. Am I now or have I ever been under investigation by the IRS for possible criminal offenses?

5. Has any civil penalty for fraud been assessed against me during the current or last three calendar years?

I authorize the IRS to release any additional relevant information necessary to respond to the questions above.

To help the IRS find my tax records and the Department of Justice to evaluate my tax history, I am voluntarily giving the following information:

Neil,

Certainly great to talk with you today as well. I look forward to meeting you in person and hopefully spending a little time on the river together. Attached are two copies of the assignment. Please send me back signed copies of both either via e-mail or fax. If you want to fax you can just use the HRO number. Also, please send the two originals via overnight courier.

In case you need them, I have also attached the Articles of Organization and the EIN number for your files. I will get you the bank account info as soon as I receive it.

If you have questions or need to reach me my cell is [redacted] and home is [redacted] (I always have access to e-mail as well).

Have a great weekend!

In accordance with 28 CFR, Part 17, "National Security Information Program," a continuing evaluation of the established need-to-know will be conducted and your office will be immediately notified to administratively withdraw the clearance when it is no longer required.

The following information is submitted: Top Secret Sensitive Compartmented Information

NAME OF EMPLOYEE: Neil M. Gorsuch

SSN: [redacted] ORGANIZATION: Office of the Associate Attorney General

DEGREE OF CLEARANCE REQUIRED: TS, SCI, SI, TK, G, HCS

JUSTIFICATION: Neil M. Gorsuch joined the Office of the Associate Attorney General as Principal Deputy Associate Attorney General on June 13, 2005 and will need a Top Secret clearance in order to attend meetings with the WH, AG, DAG, and ASG, as well as handling Top Secret documents.

THE REMAINDER OF THIS DOCUMENT WILL BE COMPLETED BY THE PERSONNEL SECURITY GROUP

TO: DATE: June 14, 2005

This acknowledges your request for Neil Gorsuch to be granted a security clearance. This office has determined that the employee is eligible to receive and has been granted a security clearance at the level of *Interim Top Secret. In addition, the Standard Form (SF) 312, Classified Information Nondisclosure Agreement, must be completed by the employee, witnessed by another DOJ employee, and forwarded to this office within 30 days of the granting of the security clearance or the security clearance cannot be certified and may be administratively canceled. The SF 312 may also be faxed to the Personnel Security Group at (202) 514-4555, ATTN: File Room.

Subsequently, the individual is eligible to have access to classified information on a need-to-know basis up to the level indicated above. The Honorable Alberto Gonzales
Attorney General of the United States
Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW
Washington, DC 20530

Dear Mr. Attorney General:

Since the first meeting of the revitalized United States Interagency Council on Homelessness was held at the White House on July 18, 2002, progress in creating the federal strategy and coordinating the response to achieve the Administration's commitment to end chronic homelessness has been historic and substantive.

It was noted at that first meeting that we have a remarkable opportunity to change the way this nation perceives - and addresses - the issue of homelessness. Since that time, the Council has moved forward to create unprecedented interagency collaborations, fostering 51 state interagency councils on homelessness, and developing 190 city and county 10-year plans to end chronic homelessness.

The Council is establishing partnerships that extend from the White House to the streets, partnering through federal agencies, state houses, city halls and county executive offices in the public sector, and through the United Way, non-profits, providers and advocates, Chambers of Commerce, businesses and corporations, faith-based and community organizations, and including homeless people themselves, in the private sector. Together, the Council and the public and private sectors are creating planful partnerships, strategic solutions, and innovative initiatives in pursuit of our goal.

Received from OAG 5/16
DOJ_NMG_0143701

Section 203[c] of the McKinney-Vento Homeless Assistance Act, as amended, (42 USC 11313) requires the Council and each member agency of the Council to prepare an annual report on their activities. Under the Act, which was reauthorized in 2001, each agency is required to prepare and submit a report to the Congress and the Council that describes:

- "Each program to assist homeless individuals administered by your agency and the number of homeless individuals served by such program;
- Impediments, including any statutory and regulatory restrictions, to the use by homeless individuals of each such program and to obtaining services or benefits under each such program; and
- Efforts made by your agency to increase the opportunities for homeless individuals to obtain shelter, food and supportive services."

The Council itself prepares a report that assesses the nature and extent of homelessness, describes USICH accomplishments and those of other agencies, and provides recommendations for legislative and administrative actions. HUD, HHS, VA and Labor have additional Congressionally mandated reporting requirements.

Attached are detailed submission instructions. Please contact Mary Ellen Hombs, USICH Deputy Director, if you have questions, at 202/708-4663. Please ensure that we receive your agency's report by Friday, June 10, 2005.

Thank you for your cooperation and support.

Sincerely,

Philip F. Mangano
Executive Director

2004 ANNUAL REPORT:

SUBMISSION REQUIREMENTS FOR MEMBER AGENCIES

Please provide a hard copy and an electronic copy (requested format: Microsoft Word/Arial 12 font) of your report by June 10, 2005. Your submission should include:

1. Overview of agency homeless assistance responsibilities and 2004 activities and accomplishments (up to two pages).

2. For each program that provides homeless assistance, a description (not to exceed one page) of the following:

   a) Statutory authority

   b) For targeted homeless assistance programs: 2004 appropriation

   c) For non-targeted programs: Best estimate of the amount of that program's assistance to the homeless for the most recent year for which information is available

   d) FY 2005 President's budget request

   e) Program description (purpose, eligible applicants/recipients, eligible activities, etc.)

   f) Planned evaluations or other studies or reports of the program's administration, performance or impact.

NOTE: In 2000 the Senate Appropriations Committee instructed the Council to specifically require HUD, HHS, Labor and VA to:

- quantify the number of their program participants who become homeless
- address ways in which mainstream programs can prevent homelessness among those they serve
- describe specifically how they provide assistance to people who are homeless.

The four agencies named above should provide this specific information on mainstream programs in addition to the general information above.

3. For each program that provides homeless assistance, a description of the following (not to exceed one page):

   a) Known impediments to access by homeless people or homeless service providers (as appropriate) and the current or planned agency response to remove those impediments; and

   b) Efforts to increase participation in the program by (as appropriate) homeless people or organizations serving homeless people.

We will also be compiling a list of currently available Federal publications on homelessness to be included as an appendix to the report. Please also provide:

1. One copy of each such publication
2. Information on how to order it (name, address, telephone number and cost, if any)
3. The Web address, if the publication is available on the Web.

Please address your submission of publications or other hard-copy material to:

Re: Grievance of Performance Appraisal

In light of the fact that the Acting Assistant Attorney General had served as the reviewing official for your 2004-2005 performance appraisal, the Office of the Associate Attorney General has reviewed the grievance you have filed pertaining to said appraisal. After reviewing the relevant documents, including the letters you submitted, the decision of the reviewing official is affirmed.

Office of the Attorney General

Washington, D.C.

May 9, 2006

Dear Mr. President:

It is an honor to enclose the nomination of Neil M. Gorsuch, of Colorado, to be a United States Circuit Judge for the Tenth Circuit, vice David M. Ebel, retired.

Mr. Gorsuch was born August 29, 1967, in Denver, Colorado, is married and has two children. He received a B.A. degree in 1988 from Columbia University, a J.D. degree in 1991 from Harvard Law School, and a D.Phil. degree in 2004 from Oxford University. He was admitted to the Colorado bar in 1994.

Since 2005, Mr. Gorsuch has been Principal Deputy to the Associate Attorney General, United States Department of Justice. Prior to his a current position, he was an associate, 1995-1997, and a partner, 1998-2005, with Kellogg, Huber, Hansen, Todd, Evans & Figel, PLLC. He served as a law clerk to the Honorable Byron R. White and the Honorable Anthony M. Kennedy of the United States Supreme Court, 1993-1994, and a law clerk to the Honorable David B. Sentelle of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, 1991-1992.

Mr. Gorsuch has an excellent reputation as to character and integrity, possesses judicial temperament, and is, I believe, worthy of appointment as a United States Circuit Judge.

I recommend that he be nominated.

Respectfully,

Alberto R. Gonzales
Attorney General

MEMORANDUM FOR THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: Neil M. Gorsuch 8/2/06
Acting Associate Attorney General

FROM: Lee J. Lofthus
Acting Assistant Attorney General
for Administration

SUBJECT: Regime Crimes Liaison Office (RCLO) – Senior Executive Service (SES) Pay Adjustment and Limited Term (LTA) SES Appointment

PURPOSE: To obtain your approval to increase Regime Crimes Liaison (RCL) [redacted] salary and to utilize an SES allocation and appoint [redacted] to an LTA SES appointment as the Deputy Regime Crimes Liaison (DRCL) in the Office of the Deputy Attorney General.

TIMETABLE: As soon as possible.

DISCUSSION: This is to request your approval to elevate [redacted] salary to $149,000. In January 2006, [redacted] was appointed to the Iraqi Special Tribunal (IST) as RCL at a salary of $143,000. As RCL, [redacted] leads U.S. investigative efforts in support of the IST and is the U.S. Liaison to the IST and to the Iraqi government in IST-related matters. In the performance of these duties, he oversees dozens of attorneys and investigators who are on the support team prosecuting Saddam Hussein and other members of his regime.

During his tenure as RCL, [redacted] has performed these highly sensitive and critical responsibilities in an exemplary manner. Working under adverse conditions, his leadership over the judgment in the first trial and the start of the second trial on genocide of the Kurds in Northern Iraq has been outstanding. His extensive legal experience has allowed him to respond to legal situations that are unique to Saddam Hussein's regime crimes trial.

In addition, this is to request approval to establish the SES position of DRCL utilizing one of DOJ's SES allocations, and to appoint [redacted] as the DRCL, in the Office of the Deputy Attorney General, at the salary of $135,000.

The establishment of the DRCL at the SES level is necessary to provide executive level advice and assistance to the RCL on all matters relating to the Iraqi High Tribunal in accordance with National Security Presidential Directive-37. The DRCL will work closely with the RCL in managing and coordinating the RCLO's numerous national and international agencies. RCLO has operations in a number of different locations and includes as many as 100 contract employees who are involved in mass gravesite exploitations.

[redacted] is currently on a temporary assignment to RCLO as an attorney with a salary of $111,104. Approval to set his pay at $135,000 represents a 21 percent increase over his currently salary. Although more than the 10 percent typically approved for initial appointment to the SES, pay at $135,000 will recognize [redacted] outstanding qualifications as well as the importance of the RCLO. If you concur, we will request the Office of Personnel Approval to appoint him as a LTA SES.

RECOMMENDATION: I recommend approval:
1. To adjust [redacted] pay to $149,000;
2. To utilize one of DOJ's undistributed SES allocations for the DRCL; and
3. To appoint [redacted] on a LTA SES appointment as the DRCL at the salary of $135,000.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: Neil M. Gorsuch 8/2/06
Acting Associate Attorney General

FROM: Lee J. Lofthus
Acting Assistant Attorney General
for Administration

SUBJECT: Regime Crimes Liaison Office (RCLO) – Senior Executive Service (SES) Pay Adjustment and Limited Term (LTA) SES Appointment

PURPOSE: To obtain your approval to increase Regime Crimes Liaison (RCL) [redacted] salary and to utilize an SES allocation and appoint [redacted] to an LTA SES appointment as the Deputy Regime Crimes Liaison (DRCL) in the Office of the Deputy Attorney General.

TIMETABLE: As soon as possible.

DISCUSSION: This is to request your approval to elevate [redacted] salary to $149,000. In January 2006, [redacted] was appointed to the Iraqi Special Tribunal (IST) as RCL at a salary of $143,000. As RCL, [redacted] leads U.S. investigative efforts in support of the IST and is the U.S. Liaison to the IST and to the Iraqi government in IST-related matters. In the performance of these duties, he oversees dozens of attorneys and investigators who are on the support team prosecuting Saddam Hussein and other members of his regime.

During his tenure as RCL, [redacted] has performed these highly sensitive and critical responsibilities in an exemplary manner. Working under adverse conditions, his leadership over the judgment in the first trial and the start of the second trial on genocide of the Kurds in Northern Iraq has been outstanding. His extensive legal experience has allowed him to respond to legal situations that are unique to Saddam Hussein's regime crimes trial.

In addition, this is to request approval to establish the SES position of DRCL utilizing one of DOJ's SES allocations, and to appoint [redacted] as the DRCL, in the Office of the Deputy Attorney General, at the salary of $135,000.

The establishment of the DRCL at the SES level is necessary to provide executive level advice and assistance to the RCL on all matters relating to the Iraqi High Tribunal in accordance with National Security Presidential Directive-37. The DRCL will work closely with the RCL in managing and coordinating the RCLO's numerous national and international agencies. RCLO has operations in a number of different locations and includes as many as 100 contract employees who are involved in mass gravesite exploitations.

[redacted] is currently on a temporary assignment to RCLO as an attorney with a salary of $111,104. Approval to set his pay at $135,000 represents a 21 percent increase over his currently salary. Although more than the 10 percent typically approved for initial appointment to the SES, pay at $135,000 will recognize [redacted] outstanding qualifications as well as the importance of the RCLO. If you concur, we will request the Office of Personnel Approval to appoint him as a LTA SES.

RECOMMENDATION: I recommend approval:

1. To adjust [redacted] pay to $149,000;
2. To utilize one of DOJ's undistributed SES allocations for the DRCL; and
3. To appoint [redacted] on a LTA SES appointment as the DRCL at the salary of $135,000.

Associate Attorney General

FROM: Lee J. Lofthus
Acting Assistant Attorney General
for Administration

SUBJECT: Increase in Basic Pay for [redacted] on her Reassignment to the Senior Executive Service (SES) Position of Comptroller, Office of Justice Programs (OJP)

PURPOSE: To obtain your approval to increase [redacted] basic pay from $146,000 to $152,000 upon reassignment as the Comptroller, OJP.

TIMETABLE: As soon as possible.

SYNOPSIS: Ms. Regina Schofield, Assistant Attorney General for Justice Programs, selected [redacted] as the Comptroller, OJP. [redacted] currently the SES Deputy Director, Finance (Auditing), Justice Management Division, is a recognized talent in the financial management community, and for her deft management of the OJP audit.

DISCUSSION: Ms. Schofield requests DAG approval to set [redacted] basic pay at $152,000, an increase of 4.2 percent over [redacted] current basic pay of $146,000, on reassignment as the Comptroller, OJP. In accordance with 5 CFR 534.404(c)(4)(ii), the DAG has the authority to make exceptions to the rule that prohibits an adjustment in an SES member's rate of basic pay more than once during a 12-month period if the SES member is reassigned to a position with substantially greater scope and responsibility. [redacted] reassignment to the position of Comptroller, OJP, meets this exception. Attached is a five-year pay history reflecting [redacted] appointment to the SES in October 2005, and prior pay adjustments, quality increases, and monetary awards during this time period. Based on salary history, [redacted] would not be considered for a pay adjustment in January 2007.

RECOMMENDATION: I recommend you approve to set [redacted] SES basic pay at $152,000, as the Comptroller, OJP.

Re: Concerns of the Assoc — osion of attorney-client privilege and work product protections in the corporate legal context

Dear Attorney General Gonzales:

On behalf of the Association of Corporate Counsel ("ACC"), thank you for the opportunity to provide input from the business community's lawyers regarding the U.S. Department of Justice's policy regarding waiver of the attorney-client and work product protections in the corporate context. As you know, ACC is the in-house bar association, serving over 19,300 individual members who work as in-house counsel in over 8,000 public, private, and not-for-profit organizations. Our officers (who send their regrets that they could not join us today), board of directors, and general members from across the country (and increasingly from around the world) appreciate the invitation to air our concerns with you today.

Concerns of the Business Community Regarding Attorney-Client and Work Product Protections

As you know, attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine are fundamental protections in the U.S. legal system that foster corporate compliance by encouraging employees and corporate leaders alike to communicate candidly with the company's counsel. Unfortunately, our members tell us of increasing concerns that their clients' rights to privileged meetings with counsel are under attack in a number of ways:

1. when prosecutors (at the federal and state level) begin investigations into allegations of wrongdoing and suggest (demand or infer) that privilege waiver is necessary to any company that wishes to engage in dialogue or influence settlement discussions, charging decisions, or the prosecutors' designation of the company as cooperative.

2. when regulators from the SEC, but also other federal and state level agencies, engage in similar kinds of co-opting behaviors in order to secure access to communications protected by the attorney-client privilege or lawyer work product.

3. when auditors, hearing the sharper scrutiny mandates present in the post-Andersen world, are no longer satisfied when any stone is left unturned, and refuse to certify a company's books or audit unless privilege has been waived and all attorney-client confidences divulged.

4. when third-party plaintiffs demand access to once-privileged records, which – because of these forced waivers – are now open to public scrutiny.

Summary of Key Revisions to the Thompson Memorandum

While ACC and a number of its partner associations in the business and legal community are assessing how to respond to these erosion concerns in all four contexts, we would like to offer you our input on how we would propose that the Department of Justice could help us reverse the trend of privilege erosion within their spheres of influence.

ACC would like to see revisions to key sections of the Thompson Memorandum. We feel that the time has come for us all to sit at the table as parties interested in ensuring that our justice system works well for all participants: we know that we both have constructive thoughts on concrete ways that the Justice Department could work with the business community to address these concerns in a mutually beneficial way. And we believe that your offices' outreach to the regional field offices is a part of that process and an important key to any solution we might craft.

Because we wish to encourage you to focus on the larger areas of common ground that we must find first, rather than starting with a re-draft of the specifics that we'd like to see changed (and that will likely engender a more argumentative response), we're only offering a summary of our general direction, below, to see if we can come to some general agreements in theory before we start looking at the technicalities and the words.

Indeed, ACC and the ABA's Task Force on Attorney-Client Privilege, along with all of the groups represented in that working group, have each developed specific language suggestions that we will all be pleased to present to you and your legal / policy team at the time and with the persons you designate as you deem appropriate. After you've had time to consider our general concerns, we would like to follow up with the appropriate leaders to arrange a meeting to further discuss our ideas in specific: perhaps in a few weeks (once Mr. McNulty is confirmed and seated?).

Here is a summary of the revisions we propose for the Thompson Memorandum:

1. Delete the waiver requirement for corporate leniency. We believe that prosecutors should be barred from requesting any waiver of attorney-client or work product protections and from "consider[ing] whether a corporation has waived its attorney-client and work product protections in assessing that corporation's cooperation for any purpose, including in the course of conducting an investigation, determining whether to bring charges, or negotiating plea agreements." Consistent with this approach, we are suggesting that references to production of information subject to attorney-client or work product protections should be eliminated or limited to the production of information not subject to these protections. These proposed revisions directly address the policy issue of greatest concern to the business community.

2. Differentiate isolated cases from a broad pattern of misconduct. These proposed revisions acknowledge the reality that even law-abiding corporate citizens occasionally have rogue employees that engage in misconduct. Conclusions about the culture, compliance programs, or even supervision of employees should be based upon a corporation's general patterns and practices, and should not be extrapolated from an isolated incident.

3. Identify practical limitations on corporate cooperation regarding individual employees. Although the Department's expectation of assistance from a corporation in targeting culpable employees and agents is appropriate in general, there are practical limitations that corporations want the DOJ to acknowledge. These include provisions addressing the recognition that companies may be bound by state indemnification laws to pay the legal fees of certain employees until they have been proven guilty, and that employees have a variety of individual rights that company's must respect, as well.

We appreciate your consideration of our concerns regarding the Department's policy on waiver of attorney-client privilege and work product protections in the corporate context.

Please do not hesitate to contact me on this or any other matter. ACC thanks you for your time and your gracious invitation to join you in your offices to open the lines of communication between our constituencies.

Sincerely,

Susan Hackett

Before the United States Sentencing Commission March 15, 2006

Presented by Susan Hackett of the Association of Corporate Counsel

On Behalf of The Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege

Honorable Commissioners, thank you for the opportunity to present the results of our newest survey on attorney-client privilege erosion in the corporate context.

My name is Susan Hackett, and I am the Senior Vice President and General Counsel of the Association of Corporate Counsel. I am here today as the representative of The Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege, which is composed of the following organizations: the American Chemistry Council, the American Civil Liberties Union[2], the Association of Corporate Counsel, Business Civil Liberties, Inc., the Business Roundtable, The Financial Services Roundtable, Frontiers of Freedom, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, the National Association of Manufacturers, the National Defense Industrial Association, the Retail Industry Leaders Association, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and the Washington Legal Foundation. The American Bar Association has also expressed similar views to the U.S. Sentencing Commission regarding the importance of preserving the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine and protecting them from federal governmental policies and practices that now seriously threaten to erode these fundamental rights.[3]

[2] The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) is a part of our coalition, but was not able to secure an approval to co-sign our underlying survey results document for its submission to the Commission by their March 1, 2006 deadline. The ACLU did sign on to our coalition's March 7, 2006, Congressional testimony on this subject, which featured and attached these survey results. [3] The ABA is prevented by internal policies from formally joining coalitions, but has worked in close cooperation with this Coalition in the preparation and distribution of the surveys referenced in this document.

Our coalition believes that the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine as applied in the corporate context are vital protections that serve society's interests and protect clients' rights to consult counsel. The attorney-client privilege is fundamental to fairness and balance in our justice system and essential to corporate compliance regimes. Without reliable privilege protections, executives and other employees will be discouraged from asking difficult questions or seeking guidance regarding the most sensitive situations and will be penalized for reporting problems they identify in the organization. Without meaningful privilege protections, lawyers are more likely to be excluded from operating in a preventive (rather than reactive) manner.

In today's complex business environment, it is increasingly important to encourage business executives and even line managers to regularly – and without any hesitation – engage their lawyers in open discussions about anything that concerns them in furtherance of assuring the corporation's legal health. It is our belief that attorney-client communications, and the confidentiality that fosters those communications, are more important than ever, and must be protected.

This coalition's members have previously testified before the Commission on the Guidelines' Chapter 8 Commentary[4] in Application Note 12 to Section 8C2.5, bestowing authority for lawyers in the Department of Justice to unilaterally determine in their discretion whether privilege waiver requests are appropriate or necessary in the corporate context. It is not our purpose today to repeat what's already been said; we believe the Commission already understands our positions well.

Instead, my purpose in appearing before you today is to: first, commend you for your decision to consider retracting the privilege waiver language that concerns us in Chapter 8's Commentary[5]; second, provide you with an overview of the survey results document you requested, which has been provided to you in support of our contentions; and third, reiterate our request that the Commission remove the clause "unless such waiver is necessary in order to provide timely and thorough disclosure of all pertinent information known to the organization" from the Guidelines'

[4] Amendments made to the US Sentencing Guidelines, which became effective in November of 2004, state that in order to qualify for a reduction in sentence for providing assistance to a government investigation, a corporation is required to waive confidentiality protections if "such waiver is necessary in order to provide timely and thorough disclosure of all pertinent information known to the organization." [U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual § 8C2.5 (2004) available at http://www.ussc.gov/2004guid/8c2_5.htm.]

[5] The coalition is fully aware that the Commission, in drafting the current language, did not intend to do harm to clients' right to counsel, and that they attempted to accommodate a number of constituencies' concerns. We don't believe that the Commission intended many of the results which we're reporting to you as concerns, but we we do hope that now that you have knowledge and evidence of them and you've re-opened the process of amendment, you'll help us redress the issue.

commentary, and consider new language stating that privilege waivers are not appropriate for the Department of Justice to demand or consider.

The 2005 Privilege Survey

I begin with a short summary of the results of the 2005 survey on privilege erosion in the corporate context[6], which provided the first meaningful empirical data on privilege erosion issues. That survey confirmed our contention that companies faced with a potential investigation, prosecution, or enforcement action:

1. are increasing in number to the point that waiver requests or expectations are considered "routine,"
2. have no meaningful ability to resist waiver expectations or demands, however they are presented,
3. will face severe consequences if they do insist on exercising their privilege rights, and
4. suffered a significant and discernable "chill" in the lawyer-client relationship, negatively impacting the lawyer's ability to work with clients to develop, implement, monitor and report on compliance initiatives that are core to the company's legal health.

Upon presentation of these survey results in hearings before this Commission in November of 2005, several Commissioners and the Department of Justice representative in particular requested that we collect further information on the nature and frequency of corporate privilege waiver requests by the government. The Coalition responded with a new survey instrument and we are pleased to offer you the survey's results here today. Please note that the results are reported in detail in the survey document referenced previously and submitted to the Commission on March 1st.

The 2006 Coalition Privilege Survey[7]

[6] An Executive Summary of the March 2005 survey may be accessed via the following links: for the in-house version: http://www.acca.com/Surveys/attyclient.pdf, and for the outside counsel version: http://www.acca.com/Surveys/attyclient_nacdl.pdf. Based on feedback from those who read the previous survey results, the 2006 survey results reside in one document that combines the results of both the in-house and outside counsel surveys.

[7] In January 2006, the Association of Corporate Counsel directly contacted approximately 4,700 of its approximately 19,000 members, including only those members whose titles included either "general counsel" or "chief legal officer," so as to avoid duplicate responses from the same company which could have led to double-counting the same incidents. Also in January, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers emailed the web link for a companion outside counsel version of the survey to its 13,000 members; and then posted the web link for the survey on its listserv for white-collar practitioners, which has approximately 1,200 subscribers. Both the in-house and outside counsel email

Demographic Information about Respondents

In-house counsel: Almost 90% of the in-house counsel survey respondents were General Counsel. Approximately 40% indicated that the government (federal or state) had initiated some form of investigation into allegations of wrongdoing at their company during the past 5 years. Fifty-one percent of the respondents indicated their companies were privately-held/owned; 35% said their companies were publicly traded but not in the Fortune 500; and 9% of respondents worked for non-profits. Quasi-governmental entities and Fortune-ranked companies each represented 1% of the survey respondents. Respondents were asked to identify the primary industry that best describes their client company's main line of business and were given 22 response options. The top three industries selected were: Finance and Insurance (18%), Manufacturing (13%), and Information Technology (11%). Almost 90% of respondents worked in law departments of less than 20 lawyers: 33% were solo practitioners, 46% had offices of 2-7 lawyers, and 10% had offices of 8-19 lawyers. Of the remaining respondents, approximately 4% had law departments of over 100 lawyers, and less than 1% had law departments of over 500 lawyers.

These demographics are significant in that they show that even among a general population of company counsel, almost half have experienced some kind of privilege erosion. The vast majority of these respondents who experienced privilege erosions do not work for mega-corporations with extremely high visibility and the potential for "blockbuster" failures; they work for a wide variety of differently sized businesses, representing the full spectrum of industries.

Outside counsel: Seventy-one percent of those who answered the survey for outside counsel were partners in law firms, and 40% practiced criminal litigation as their solicitations requested recipients to complete a web-based survey on attorney client privilege protections and erosion. The web link to the survey was also made available to the Coalition's leaders, and the ABA Task Force on Attorney-Client Privilege, which in turn publicized it to the many groups participating in the Task Force's endeavors, including approximately 5,000 members of the Business Law and Criminal Justice Sections. The survey was "open" for approximately 2 weeks. Five hundred sixty-six of the 676 responses to the in-house version of the survey were received from the Association of Corporate Counsel emailing to its general counsel members; the remaining corporate counsel responses are from contacts initiated by the other groups. Five hundred thirty-eight outside counsel responded to this survey, the vast majority coming from the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers' white-collar practitioners' membership. In total, our surveys generated approximately 1200 responses.

Both surveys included 23 questions primarily seeking specific responses to multiple choice or yes/no questions, with 4 open-ended questions at the end seeking text responses that would provide personal detail on situational experiences.

The survey results are presented in numbers and percentages that are approximated by rounding to the nearest whole integer. Some direct quotations drawn from the open-ended text responses are also included, but not all responses to those questions are included out a concern for confidentiality in some cases and to avoid unnecessary repetition in most cases. We believe the survey's response rate should be considered robust; but since we are not an independent surveying company or statisticians, we can make no proffer that the sampling is statistically significant or representative of the entire profession. We can note that statisticians have designated the Association of Corporate Counsel's membership as statistically representative of the entire in-house legal profession.

primary area of concentration (26% indicated civil litigation and 20% indicated transactional work as their primary practice areas). Sixty-three percent represented companies that had been subject to a criminal or enforcement investigation in the last five years. Further demographics show that 22 % of outside counsel respondents represented privately-held or -owned companies with revenues of less than $200 million annually; 20% represented individual officers or employees of organizations; only 12% represented publicly traded companies with more than $1 billion in annual revenue; and only 11% represented publicly-traded companies with between $500 million and $1 billion in annual revenue. About the outside counsel themselves, we know that 35% of respondents work for firms of between 2 and 20 lawyers; the rest of the respondents were fairly evenly distributed among the following categories: solo (19%); 21-100 lawyers (17%); 101-500 lawyers (15%); more than 500 lawyers (14%).

As with the results of the survey of in-house counsel, outside counsel answers indicate that among a general population of outside counsel with a wide array of experience, both in terms of the types of law that they practice and the types of clients that they represent, 51% indicate that they experienced a demand, suggestion, inquiry, or other expectation of waiver by the government. A commanding 73% agree that a culture of waiver has evolved with respect to the corporate attorney-client privilege. The sizable plurality of lawyers who answered this survey represented either smaller, privately held companies or individuals—thus belying the conclusion that waiver requests, demands, and expectations are a rare problem only experienced by large, publicly-traded companies who are at the center of "headline" scandals and somehow deserving of whatever treatment the government dishes out.

What the Respondents Said

We encourage the Commission particularly to listen the voices of corporate counsel and defense attorneys as captured in the survey results document on several pages containing direct quotes at the end of the document. These responses are but a portion of those penned in response to the open-ended questions at the end of the survey, which asked respondents the following:

> 24) Please describe a typical situation, or situations, in which your corporation/client waived attorney-client privilege and/or work product protections in order to avoid criminal prosecution or more severe civil penalties; please consider including information on which party suggested or demanded waiver, whether the company waived, what material was sought or produced pursuant to the waiver, and what kind of charges were being investigated.

25) If the Federal Sentencing Guidelines for organizations were mentioned during negotiations with a prosecutor or enforcement official, please describe how they were cited, and whether the commentary language in the Guidelines regarding privilege waiver was specifically referred to.

26) If your corporation or client has waived privilege at the neutral suggestion of a prosecutor or enforcement official, or without any suggestion or demand from a government official, please describe the situation, including why the corporation decided to waive privilege and as to what material.

27) Please provide any additional commentary on privilege erosion, protection or waiver issues that you think is germane.

I do not need to read these responses into the record for you to hear respondents' outrage (or perhaps another apt description would be "disbelief") regarding government practices vis a vis the privilege; it jumps off the pages. Respondents wrote time and again of prosecutorial abuses (their words), coercion (their words), and inappropriate hijacking of court-governed doctrines that their clients were subjected to when privilege waiver discussions arose. The comments detail stories about prosecutors demanding waiver of companies that are not even the target of the government's investigation. They tell of prosecutors whose opening requests at their first meetings with counsel – before any discussion of the facts or knowledge of what the investigation into allegations might entail or uncover – were to demand privilege waivers as a condition of cooperation and as a requirement for any further conversation to continue. Respondents wrote about how their clients were painted into a privilege waiver corner where they were told that of course they had choices: to waive or face criminal charges against the corporation, with entity-threatening consequences (the suggestion being that if the company did waive, it wouldn't be charged at all). And underlying all of these stories are concerns that these lawyers have regarding the damage done to their relationship with clients as a result of this culture of waiver: they're concerned that employees are no longer confident about including attorneys in business discussions or seeking legal advice when thorny problems arise. These are real voices. These are hundreds of lawyers who've personally witnessed waiver demands made by the government. And these are only a small number of voices whom we happened to contact and hear back from. You cannot read these pages and conclude that waiver problems are non-existent or rare; indeed, you must conclude, as do our respondents, that a government culture of waiver now exists and that it infects large numbers of government investigations and prosecutions.

What did respondents say in specific?

Does a Government Culture of Waiver Exist? Yes. Almost 75% of both inside and outside counsel expressed agreement (almost 40% agreeing strongly) with a statement that "a 'culture of waiver' has evolved in which governmental agencies believe it is reasonable and appropriate for them to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or work product protections." Only 1% of inside counsel and 2.5 % of outside counsel disagreed with the statement.

The 'Government's Expectation'[8] of Waiver Confirmed: Of the respondents who confirmed that they or their clients had been subject to investigation in the last five years, approximately 30% of in-house respondents and 51% of outside respondents said that the government expected waiver as a condition to engaging in bargaining or to be eligible to receive more favorable or lenient treatment.

Waiver is a Condition of Cooperation: Fifty-two percent of in-house respondents and 59% of outside respondents confirmed that they believe that there has been a marked increase in waiver requests as a condition of cooperation. Consistent with that finding, roughly half of all investigations or other inquiries experienced by survey respondents resulted in privilege waivers.

Further, and to refute the point often made that corporations aren't asked to waive, but they "volunteer" to waive on their own: Prosecutors Typically Request Privilege Waiver – It Is Rarely "Inferred" by Counsel. Of those who have been investigated, 55% of outside counsel responded that waiver of the attorney-client privilege was requested by enforcement officials either directly or indirectly. Twenty-seven percent of in-house counsel confirmed this to be true.[9] Only 8% percent of outside counsel and 3% of in-house counsel said that they "inferred it was expected."

The Sentencing Guidelines are Listed by Respondents as Among the Top Three Reasons Given For Waiver Demands. This Commission specifically asked us to find out if it was reasonable to assume that the Sentencing Guidelines' language was in [8] The survey defined 'government expectation' of waiver as a demand, suggestion, inquiry or other showing of expectation by the government that the company should waive the attorney-client privilege.

[9] Sixty percent of in-house counsel who'd had experience with a waiver request responded "N/A" (not applicable) to this question, suggesting they had not been present when privilege waivers were discussed.

some part responsible for privilege waiver problems – if it was a "hook," in essence, upon which to hang a privilege waiver request – or if our concerns should be addressed to others who engage in privilege waiver discussions on a direct basis. The facts are in: outside counsel indicated that the DOJ's internal policies (the Thompson/Holder/McCallum Memoranda) are cited most frequently when a reason for waiver is provided by a prosecutor or enforcement official, and the Sentencing Guidelines are cited second. In-house counsel placed the Guidelines third, behind the need for "a quick and efficient resolution of the matter," and DOJ policies (Thompson/Holder/McCallum), respectively. Given that a number of other choices were presented, it's more than fair to conclude that respondents have been hearing about the Guidelines from prosecutors quite regularly when waiver discussions arise.

And it's Likewise Clear that the Majority of Waiver Requests are Coming from US Attorneys. For both in-house and outside counsel, the U.S. Attorneys' Offices were identified as the government agency that most often indicated an expectation of waiver. The survey asked respondents to identify which agencies indicated an expectation of waiver and were given a choice of seven enumerated agencies/categories of agencies, as well as the opportunity to state that the question did not apply or to write-in a response. (About one-third of the in-house respondents and one-fourth of outside counsel respondents indicated that this question was not applicable.) The top agencies/categories identified as most often expecting waiver (in descending order) were: (for in-house counsel) U.S. Attorneys' Offices, the SEC, the Department of Justice – "Main" (e.g., antitrust or criminal fraud), other federal agencies (e.g., DOL, EPA, HHS, FEC, etc.), and State Attorneys General Offices; for outside counsel, the order was exactly the same except that the number 2 and 3 slots for the SEC and DOJ – Main were reversed.

In the interest of time, I will not further summarize findings in my oral statement which are already discussed in greater detail in the written statement we've submitted, but please note that the written statement included additional information about the types of attorney-client communications or work product documents that are sought in waiver demands, and further details of the timing and "atmospherics" of waiver demands made of corporations. We also added a few questions with interesting answers on the experiences of corporations regarding government demands beyond waiver requests, but related to corporate employees: including requests for the company not to advance legal expenses (even in the presence of state laws and corporate bylaw provisions which mandate indemnification), company experiences with prosecutors who wish to control decisions related to joint defense agreements with targeted employees, requests that the company refuse to share requested documents with targeted employees, and demands that a company discharge an employee who would not consent to a government interview.

Taken together, these survey results present an unparalleled look into the role of waiver in the prosecutorial process that most of us hope we'll never personally experience, but which we now know is relatively commonplace for companies that have received notice that an allegation of wrongdoing has been made against them.

Movement Toward a Solution to these Problems ...

As you know, our Coalition has petitioned this Commission to reconsider the privilege waiver language of the Commentary at USSG Section 8C2.5, Application Note 12. We believe that our submission of evidence from our surveys in 2005 and now in 2006 documents that 1.) waiver demands are being made routinely and inappropriately, 2.) that waiver demands are being justified under the authority given through this provision of the Sentencing Guidelines, and that 3.) clients experiencing waiver demands are becoming less likely to consult their lawyers or include them in daily decision-making as a result of 1.) and 2.), to the detriment of corporate compliance programs. Accordingly, we request that at a minimum, the waiver clause in the Guidelines' Commentary be removed, and that the Commission consider inserting language in its stead that prohibits the DOJ from any consideration of privilege waivers – positive or negative – in the charging or negotiation discussions and decisions.

Specifically, we'd suggest that in Section 8C2.5, Application Note 12 would read as follows:

"12. To qualify for a reduction under subsection (g)(1) or (g)(2), cooperation must be both timely and thorough. To be timely, the cooperation must begin essentially at the same time as the organization is officially notified of a criminal investigation. To be thorough, the cooperation should include the disclosure of all pertinent non-privileged information known by the organization. A prime test of whether the organization has disclosed all pertinent non-privileged information is whether the information is sufficient for law enforcement personnel to identify the nature and extent of the offense and the individual(s) responsible for the criminal conduct. However, the cooperation to be measured is the cooperation of the organization itself, not the cooperation of individuals within the organization. If, because of the lack of cooperation of particular individual(s), neither the organization nor law enforcement personnel are able to identify the culpable individual(s) within the organization despite the organization's efforts to cooperate fully, the organization may still be given credit for full cooperation. Waiver of attorney-client privilege and of work product protections is not a factor in determining whether ~~a prerequisite to~~ a reduction in culpability score under subdivisions (1) and (2) of subsection (g) is warranted ~~unless such waiver is necessary in order to provide timely and thorough disclosure of all pertinent information known to the organization~~."

We are hopeful that in light of the empirical information we've provided that you will favorably consider our request and propose amendment of the Sentencing Guidelines accordingly in your 2006 Amendment cycle. We believe that if we are able to remove the sources of waiver authority that the Department relies upon, it will be possible to begin to argue more effectively for a change to inappropriate prosecutorial policies and practices, and find a solution that will help to restore the attorney-client privilege to its rightful position: as every client's right.

My original testimony referenced the statements of Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum of the Department of Justice before the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security, which held hearings on March 7, 2006 at the Coalition's request on the privilege erosion issue. Mr. McCallum suggested that the DOJ did not have any problems with removing the privilege waiver language from the Guidelines. I understand that in his appearance before you this morning, he retracted that statement and said that the Department's request of the Commission is to leave the language of the Commentary as it is.

I would noted that Mr. McCallum's comments before the Congress were made in an environment in which every Member of the Subcommittee, from both sides of the aisle, expressed rigorous support for the coalition's goals and were openly critical of DOJ policies and practices on wavier. The record of that hearing will soon be available, and we will be happy to forward it to you so that you can be advised of the Judiciary Committee's reaction to this issue; it may be possible for the Commission to get a jump on responding to this issue in a fashion that is consistent with Congress' current thinking.

Thank you for your time and attention to this important matter, and your kind consideration of my comments. I'm happy to answer any questions I can for you.

Re: Comments on "Chapter Eight – Privilege Waiver"

Dear Sir/Madam:

The Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege, which is composed of the undersigned organizations,[1] is pleased to provide these comments on the Commission's Notice of Proposed Amendments, Request for Public Comment, and Notice of Public Hearings for the amendment cycle ending May 1, 2006.[2] These comments exclusively address Final Priority (6): "review, and possible amendment," of the language regarding waiver of attorney-client privilege and work product protections contained in the Commentary to Section 8C2.5 of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines. For the reasons explained below, we urge the Commission to amend that language to clarify that waiver of attorney-client privilege and work product protections should not be a factor in determining whether a sentencing reduction for cooperation with the government is warranted.

Background

On April 30, 2004, the Commission submitted to Congress a number of amendments to Chapter 8 of the Guidelines relating to organizations. Included in these amendments, all of which became effective on November 1, 2004, was the addition of the following new language to the Commentary for Section 8C2.5of the Guidelines:

> Waiver of attorney-client privilege and of work product protections is not a prerequisite to a reduction in culpability score [for cooperation with the government]...unless such waiver is necessary in order to provide timely and thorough disclosure of all pertinent information known to the organization.

[1]The Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege includes the following organizations: American Chemistry Council, Association of Corporate Counsel, Business Civil Liberties, Inc., Business Roundtable, the Financial Services Roundtable, Frontiers of Freedom, National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, National Association of Manufacturers, National Defense Industrial Association, Retail Industry Leaders Association, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, and Washington Legal Foundation. The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) is a part of the coalition as well but was not able to secure approval to co-sign this comment letter prior to today's deadline. The ACLU did sign the coalition's August 15, 2005 comment letter to the Commission, referenced in footnote 5, infra, which makes many of the same substantive points outlined in this comment letter. Although the American Bar Association is prevented by internal policies from formally joining coalitions, it is working in close cooperation with the Coalition to Preserve the Attorney-Client Privilege on the privilege waiver issue and will be filing separate comments with the Commission today on the issue of "Chapter Eight – Privilege Waiver."

[2] 71 Fed. Reg. 4782-4804 (January 27, 2006)

Before the adoption of the privilege waiver amendment, the Commentary was silent on privilege and contained no suggestion that such a waiver would ever be a factor in charging or sentencing decisions. The issue of waiver emerged during deliberations of the Commission's Ad Hoc Advisory Group on the Organizational Guidelines. The Advisory Group was concerned about the effect on effective corporate compliance programs of the Justice Department's privilege waiver policies, as spelled out in the Holder and Thompson Memoranda.[3] After considering the views of the Department of Justice, various bar associations, and regulated entities—and weighing the concerns raised by numerous representatives of the business community and various legal groups—the Advisory Group recommended privilege waiver language somewhat similar to, though more general than, the language quoted above. The Commission revised that language and incorporated it into the 2004 amendments to the Guidelines.

After the 2004 privilege waiver amendment to the Guidelines was adopted, a broader cross-section of business, legal, and public policy organizations, including many of the undersigned entities and the American Bar Association (ABA), began to evaluate the substantive and practical impact of the waiver provision on their operations—and on the legal and business communities in general—and communicated their concerns to the Commission. On March 3, 2005, the coalition sent a letter to the Commission expressing its concerns over the privilege waiver amendment. The ABA expressed similar concerns in its separate letter to the Commission dated May 17, 2005.

In June 2005, the Sentencing Commission issued its "Notice of Proposed Priorities and Request for Public Comment" for the amendment cycle ending May 1, 2006, in which it stated its tentative plans to reconsider the 2004 privilege waiver amendment to the Federal Sentencing Guidelines during its 2005-2006 amendment cycle. In response, the coalition submitted a comment letter to the Commission on August 15, 2005, urging it to reverse the privilege waiver amendment and add language to the Guidelines stating that waiver should not be a factor in determining cooperation. Similar comment letters opposing the November 2004 privilege waiver amendment were also filed by a prominent group of nine former senior Justice Department officials—including three former Attorneys General—and by the ABA.

In August 2005, the Sentencing Commission issued its "Notice of Final Priorities" for the amendment cycle ending May 1, 2006, in which it stated its intent to formally reconsider the 2004 privilege waiver amendment to the Federal Sentencing Guidelines. Subsequently, several organizations from the coalition, former Attorney General Dick Thornburgh, and the ABA, testified before the Commission on November 15, 2005, on the subject of privilege waiver. During the November 15 hearing, the coalition presented the results of its April 2005 surveys of in-house and outside counsel, both of which confirmed the importance of the privilege to corporate counsel and the growing trend of government-coerced privilege waiver.[4] At that hearing, the Commission asked coalition members to help to gather additional information and data regarding the frequency with which governmental entities have been requesting that businesses waive their privileges as a condition for cooperation credit, as well as the effects of these waiver requests.

[3] The Justice Department's privilege waiver policy originated with the adoption of a 1999 memorandum by then-Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder, also known as the "Holder Memorandum," that encouraged federal prosecutors to request that companies waive their privileges as a condition for receiving cooperation credit during investigations. The Department's waiver policy was expanded in a January 2003 memorandum written by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, also known as the "Thompson Memorandum." Subsequently, then-Acting Deputy Attorney General Robert McCallum sent a memorandum to all U.S. Attorneys and Department Heads in October 2005 instructing each of them to adopt "a written waiver review process for your district or component," although the directive—also known as the "McCallum Memorandum"—does not establish any minimum standards for, or require national uniformity regarding, privilege waiver demands by prosecutors. The Thompson and McCallum Memoranda are available online at http://www.usdoj.gov/dag/cftf/business_organizations.pdf and http://www.abanet.org/poladv/mccallummemo212005.pdf, respectively.

After considering the comments and testimony presented by the coalition, the ABA, and others,[5] the Commission issued its Notice of Proposed Amendments, Request for Public Comment, and Notice of Public Hearings on January 27, 2006. One of the issues on which the Commission sought public comment was the issue of "Chapter Eight – Privilege Waiver." In particular, the Commission sought additional comment on the following specific issues:

> (1) whether this commentary language [in Application Note 12 of Section 8C2.5 of the Guidelines] is having unintended consequences; (2) if so, how specifically has it adversely affected the application of the sentencing guidelines and the administration of justice; (3) whether this commentary language should be deleted or amended; and (4) if it should be amended, in what manner.[6]

In response to the Commission's November 15, 2005, request for additional information and data on the frequency of government demands for privilege waiver and their effects, the coalition undertook a second, more detailed survey of in-house and outside corporate counsel. The results of the new survey were presented to the Commission in early March 2006.[7] Subsequently, on March 15, 2006, two representatives of the coalition—Susan Hackett of the Association of Corporate Counsel (ACC) and Kent Wicker of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers (NACDL)—testified before the Commission regarding the results of the new survey.

Unintended Consequences of the 2004 Privilege Waiver Amendment to the Guidelines

The coalition continues to believe that the 2004 changes to the Section 8C2.5 Commentary of the Sentencing Guidelines, though well-intentioned, have helped cause a number of profoundly negative unintended consequences. The results of our new survey provide substantial and compelling evidence supporting the validity of these concerns. In our view, the 2004 privilege waiver amendment to the Guidelines, combined with the existing Justice Department privilege waiver policy as expressed in the Holder and Thompson Memoranda, has led to the following negative consequences:

•The privilege waiver amendment and related Justice Department policies and practices have forced companies to waive their attorney-client and work product protections in most cases. The problem of coerced waiver that began with the 1999 Holder Memorandum and the 2003 Thompson Memorandum was exacerbated when the Commission added the new privilege waiver language to the Section 8C2.5 Commentary in 2004. While the new language begins by stating a general rule that a waiver is "not a prerequisite" for a reduction in the culpability score—and leniency—under the Guidelines, that statement is followed by a very broad and subjective exception for situations where prosecutors contend that waiver "is necessary in order to provide timely and thorough disclosure of all pertinent information known to the organization." Without some meaningful oversight over what waivers prosecutors may deem to be "necessary," this exception essentially swallows the rule. Prior to the change, the Commentary was silent on the issue and contained no suggestion that such a waiver would ever be required.

Now that this amendment has become effective, it is the experience of our members that the Justice Department is even more likely than it was before to require companies to waive their privileges in almost all cases. Adding to our concern, it is our perception that the Justice Department, as well as other enforcement agencies, view the lack of Congressional disapproval of this amendment as Congressional ratification of the Department's policy of routinely requiring privilege waiver. From a practical standpoint, companies increasingly have no choice but to waive these privileges whenever the government demands it, as the government's threat to indict them for being "uncooperative" presents an unacceptable prospect of diminished or destroyed public image, stock price, and standing in the marketplace.

The concerns previously expressed by the coalition that government-coerced waiver had become routine—and that the 2004 privilege waiver amendment was a significant factor contributing to that trend—were confirmed by the results of the new coalition survey. In particular, the survey revealed the following trends:

A Government "Culture of Waiver" Exists. Almost 75% of both inside and outside corporate counsel respondents believe (almost 40% believe strongly) that a "'culture of waiver' has evolved in which governmental agencies believe it is reasonable and appropriate for them to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or work product protections." (Only 1% of inside counsel and 2.5 % of outside counsel disagreed with the statement.)

Waiver is a Condition of Cooperation. Fifty-two percent of in-house respondents and 59% of outside respondents confirmed that they believe that there has been a marked increase in waiver requests as a condition of cooperation. Consistent with that finding, roughly half of all investigations or other inquiries experienced by survey respondents resulted in privilege waivers.

A "Government Expectation"[8] of Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege Confirmed. Of the respondents who confirmed that they or their clients had been subject to investigation in the last five years, approximately 30% of in-house respondents and 51% of outside respondents said that the government expected waiver in order for a company to engage in bargaining or to be eligible to receive more favorable treatment.

[8] The survey defined 'government expectation' of waiver as a demand, suggestion, inquiry or other showing of expectation by the government that the company should waive the attorney-client privilege.

Prosecutors Typically Request Privilege Waiver – It Is Rarely "Inferred" by Counsel. Of those who have been investigated, 55% of outside counsel responded that waiver of the attorney-client privilege was requested by enforcement officials either directly or indirectly. Twenty-seven percent of in-house counsel confirmed this to be true.[9] Only 8% percent of outside counsel and 3% of in-house counsel said that they "inferred it was expected."

Sentencing Guidelines Rank Second Only to Justice Department Policies Among the Reasons Given For Waiver Demands. Outside counsel indicated that while the Justice Department's waiver policies (i.e., the Thompson/Holder/McCallum Memoranda) are cited most frequently when a reason for waiver is provided by an enforcement official, the Sentencing Guidelines are cited second. In-house counsel placed the Guidelines third, behind "a quick and efficient resolution of the matter," and Justice Department policies, respectively.

Based on this survey data, and the voluminous anecdotal evidence provided by the in-house and outside corporate counsel in the essay portions of our survey, it is clear that government demands for privilege waiver have become routine and that the 2004 privilege waiver amendment to the Guidelines have been a significant contributing factor to this growing trend.

•The 2004 privilege waiver amendment has helped to weaken the confidentiality of communications between companies and their lawyers. Lawyers for companies and other organizations play a key role in helping these entities and their officials comply with the law and act in the entity's best interests. To fulfill this role, lawyers must enjoy the trust and confidence of managers, boards, and other key personnel of the entity and must be provided with all relevant information necessary to properly represent that entity. By authorizing and encouraging routine government demands for waiver of attorney-client and work product protections, the privilege waiver amendment discourages personnel within companies and other organizations from consulting with their lawyers. This, in turn, seriously impedes the lawyers' ability to effectively counsel compliance with the law.

The results of the original, April 2005 surveys of in-house and outside corporate counsel conducted by the ACC and the NACDL confirmed the important purpose that privilege and work product doctrines serve in facilitating the lawyer's work, with over 95% of respondents expressing agreement with this principle. (See April 2005 ACC and NACDL surveys at pgs. 4 and 5, respectively) In addition, over 90% of respondents in both surveys believed that the privilege enhances the likelihood that company employees will discuss sensitive/difficult issues regarding legal compliance. (Id. at pgs. 4 and 6, respectively) The April 2005 surveys also confirmed the chilling effect that privilege waiver would have on the confidential attorney-client relationship. According to those surveys, approximately 95% of both in-house and outside corporate counsel agreed that there would be "a 'chill' in the flow/candor of information provided to counsel if the privilege did not offer protection to client communications or your attorney work-product." (Id. at p. 3) survey, numerous in-house and outside corporate counsel confirmed that government-coerced waiver policies have had a severe chilling effect on the attorney-client relationship and on the ability of corporate attorneys to counsel their clients to comply with the law. The following quotations are typical of the many narrative responses to the survey's open-ended questions:

In addition, in response to the open-ended text questions offered at the end of the new March 2006

[9] Sixty percent of in-house counsel who had experience with a waiver request responded "N/A" (not applicable) to this question, suggesting they had not been present when privilege waivers were discussed.

> "The fear of privilege waiver has curtailed my ability to frankly and strongly direct my colleagues in areas of risk. I can no longer send memos that say: 'under no circumstances may you do this,' or the like, for fear of reprisal [in the future]. My inability to speak forthrightly forces my advice to be sugar-coated in ways that I believe lessen my power and effectiveness to force others to do the right thing...When things appear as if they will be highly sensitive, I carefully retain outside counsel, often in matters I could handle better internally, thereby wasting significant not-for-profit dollars because of the government's inappropriate intrusion in this formerly sacrosanct land." (See March 2006 survey results at p. 15)

> "Our corporate strategy is to have in-house counsel active and involved in business deals early and often. We have found that this significantly minimizes the risk that employees engage in questionable behavior. This 'prevention' strategy demands on open dialogue with employees. DOJ demands for waiver have a chilling effect on our employees seeking out in-house counsel to discuss potentially tricky legal situations. We depend on open lines of communication with employees and these are being strained by DOJ's policy and their push to alter the Sentencing Guidelines. We should have policies in place that encourage dialogue with employees. DOJ's waiver push is short sighted and counter productive." (Id.)

> "It is my opinion that the concept of the government asking any person (either individual or corporate) to waive attorney-client privilege in order to facilitate their investigation is a travesty of justice. The attorney-client privilege is there as a means to have open discussions between the client and their attorney regarding all possibilities. To allow for this type of request will merely result in many corporations no longer including in-house counsel in important decision making processes which may in fact lead to even more wrongdoing." (Id.)

> "In my experience, it is remarkably difficult for corporations and their employees to get legal advice in today's environment. There is a clear expectation -- sometimes unspoken, often spoken -- that any communication, privileged or not, will be shared with the government. There is no balancing of the advantages of waiver against the risks, including the company's ability to defend itself in ongoing civil litigation. This puts company counsel in a completely untenable position, unable to give or seek advice freely. The important purposes behind the privilege are simply being ignored." (Id. at p. 16)

> "Reviewing the reports of waivers and requested waivers in the general press and in the legal periodicals has had a chilling effect on my function as general counsel. I warn our senior managers regularly that they should not count on having any privilege regarding their communications with me. We try hard to follow the law at this organization, so criminal prosecution is not a concern. What is a concern is that the continued erosion of privilege in prosecution by state and federal agencies will spill over into the civil arena. We are in a business sector in which litigation is common and the stakes are often very large. The self-censoring I feel compelled to do at this point hinders the company's ability to protect against or plan for anticipated claims." (Id.)

> "As a result of our experiences, we now routinely advise our clients that there is...[no] such thing as information protected by the attorney client privilege. Although I have no belief that the prosecutors requiring the waivers understand what they have done, within a matter of a few years, these attorneys have utterly eviscerated the attorney client privilege and undermined the most important aspect of the attorney client relationship. As a result, instead of advancing the interests of the public, government attorneys have now created a situation where clients are going to be less, not more, forthcoming; a result that will only lead to more corporate misdeeds." (Id.)
> "At this stage, much of the damage is done--one has to conduct affairs, take (or not) notes, write communications and obtain information on the assumption that there will be no protection. In that environment, lawyers are already much less effective in discovering information and counseling compliant conduct." (Id.)

The sheer number of these and the many other unequivocal responses to the new survey demonstrate that prosecutors' routine demands for waiver—further exacerbated by the 2004 amendment to the Guidelines—have seriously weakened the confidential attorney-client relationship between many companies and their lawyers and made it more difficult for the lawyers to counsel compliance with the law.

•The privilege waiver amendment helps to undermine internal compliance programs. The net effect of the privilege waiver amendment and other government policies encouraging routine waiver is to make the detection of corporate misconduct more difficult by undermining companies' internal compliance programs and procedures. As the Commission itself has repeatedly emphasized, effective corporate compliance mechanisms, which often include internal investigations conducted by the company's in-house or outside lawyers, are one of the most effective tools for detecting and flushing out malfeasance. Indeed, Congress recognized the value of these compliance tools when it enacted the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. The April 2005 surveys confirmed the important contribution that the attorney-client privilege makes to internal compliance programs, with over 94% of corporate counsel respondents agreeing that the privilege improves the lawyer's ability to monitor, enforce, and improve compliance initiatives. (See April 2005 ACC and NACDL surveys at pgs. 4 and 6, respectively.) Unfortunately, because the effectiveness of these internal investigations depends on the ability of the individuals with knowledge to speak candidly and confidentially with the lawyer conducting the investigation, any uncertainty as to whether attorney-client and work product privileges will be honored makes it more difficult for companies to detect and remedy wrongdoing early. Therefore, by further encouraging prosecutors to seek waiver on a routine basis, the privilege waiver amendment undermines, rather than promotes, good compliance practices.

The new March 2006 survey confirmed the fact that when prosecutors request that a company waive its privileges, they often seek sensitive documents directly relating to companies' internal investigations, including (1) written reports of an internal investigation, (2) files and work papers that supported an internal investigation, (3) lawyers' interview notes or memos or transcripts of interviews with employees who were targets, (4) notes/oral recollections of privileged conversations with or reports to senior executives, board members, or board committees, and (5) lawyers' interview notes with employees who were not available for interviews by the government or memos/transcripts of the same. (See March 2006 survey at pgs. 8-10) Clearly, prosecutors are taking a very expansive view regarding the types of sensitive internal materials that companies should be forced to turn over during investigations.

•The privilege waiver amendment unfairly harms employees by infringing on their individual rights. The privilege waiver amendment and the other governmental policies encouraging routine waiver place the employees of a company or other organization in a very difficult position when their employers ask them to cooperate in an investigation. They can cooperate and risk that statements made to the company's or organization's lawyers will be turned over to the government by the entity, or they can decline to cooperate and risk losing their employment. It is fundamentally unfair to force employees to choose between keeping their jobs and preserving their legal rights.

In the new survey, many outside corporate counsel confirmed that government-coerced waiver has had substantial adverse effects on companies' employees in a number of specific ways. A majority of the outside counsel who responded to the survey cited instances in which prosecutors encouraged or required companies to take certain actions against employees, including (1) not advancing legal expenses to, or agreeing to reimburse, a targeted employee, (2) not entering into, or breaching, a joint defense agreement with a targeted employee, (3) refusing to share requested documents with a targeted employee, or (4) discharging an employee who would not consent to be interviewed by the government. (See March 2006 survey at p. 13.)

Moreover, many if not most corporate criminal investigations do not involve black-and-white types of potential criminality, such as embezzlement. Particularly in the environmental field, there can be substantial question whether the conduct that the government posits is even illegal. In such cases, companies are often being coerced to identify, and treat as possible criminals, employees whose conduct they regard as lawful. In such "gray" areas, the possibility that employees' conversations with company counsel may be turned over to the government can quickly and prematurely squelch such communications.

For all these reasons, we believe that the privilege waiver amendment is flawed and uniquely dangerous to our shared goal of protecting the policies that are advanced by the attorney-client relationship.

Congressional Concern Regarding Privilege Wavier

In addition to the coalition, the ABA, and the former senior Justice Department officials referenced above, many prominent Congressional leaders have also expressed serious concerns regarding both the 2004 privilege waiver amendment to the Sentencing Guidelines and the Justice Department's internal privilege waiver policy.

On March 7, 2006, the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism, and Homeland Security held a hearing on the subject of "White Collar Enforcement (Part 1): Attorney-Client Privilege and Corporate Waivers." Witnesses testifying at the hearing included Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum, former Attorney General Dick Thornburgh, U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Thomas Donohue, and William Sullivan, Jr. of the law firm of Winston & Strawn.[10]

[10] The written testimony of each of the witnesses who appeared at the March 7, 2006 hearing and the letter submitted by

During the hearing, the Chairman of the Subcommittee, Rep. Howard Coble (R-NC), expressed his strong support for the attorney-client privilege and his concerns regarding routine prosecutor demands for waiver during investigations. After noting the "institutional tension between preserving corporate attorney-client and work product privileges and a prosecutor's quest to unearth the truth about criminal acts," Chairman Coble made the following remarks:

> Prosecutors must be zealous and vigorous in their efforts to bring corporate actors to justice. However, zeal does not in my opinion equate with coercion in fair enforcement of these laws. To me, the important question is whether prosecutors seeking to investigate corporate crimes can gain access to the information without requiring a waiver of the attorney-client privilege. There is no excuse for prosecutors to require privilege waivers as a routine matter, it seems to me. This subcommittee will examine the important issue with a keen eye to determine whether Federal prosecutors are routinely requiring cooperating corporations to waive such privilege...[In addition to the McCallum Memorandum of October 21, 2005,] I am also aware of the fact that the Sentencing Commission is examining its current policy of encouraging such waivers when determining the nature and extent of cooperation. While the guidelines do not explicitly mandate a waiver of privileges for the full benefit of cooperation, in practical terms we have to make sure that they do not operate to impose a requirement...

During the March 7 hearing, the Subcommittee's Ranking Member, Rep. Robert Scott (D-VA), expressed similar concerns regarding erosion of the attorney-client privilege. After acknowledging the many policy reasons for preserving the privilege, Rep. Scott noted:

> For some time now I have been concerned about reports that the Department of Justice is coercing corporations to waive their attorney-client privilege during criminal investigations of the corporation and its employees by making waiver a prerequisite for consideration by the Department and its recommendation for not challenging leniency should criminal conduct be established...It is one thing for officials of a corporation to break the attorney-client privilege in their own self-interest by their own volition. It is another thing for the Department to require or coerce it by making leniency considerations contingent upon it, even when it is merely on a fishing expedition on the part of the Department. Complaints have indicated that the practice of requiring a waiver of the corporate attorney-client privilege has become routine. And of course, why wouldn't it be the case? What is the advantage to the Department of not requiring a waiver in the corporate investigation?...Now, coercing corporate attorney-client privileges has not been—has not long been the practice in the Department. It has really been the last two administrations that have practiced this, and it has been growing by leaps and bounds...

Similar concerns were also raised during the hearing by Reps. Dan Lungren (R-CA)—who previously served as California Attorney General—and William Delahunt (D-MA)—a long-time former prosecutor. During the question and answer period, Rep. Lungren reiterated his longstanding opposition to the 2004 privilege waiver amendment to the Sentencing Guidelines: the ABA to the Subcommittee regarding the hearing are available at http://www.abanet.org/poladv/testimony306.pdf.

> Just to put it on the record, I have submitted a letter last August to the Sentencing Commission regarding my concerns about the Sentencing Commission's commentary with respect to the rule. It looks to me like that amendment authorizes and encourages the Government to require entities to waive the attorney-client privilege and work product protections as a condition of showing cooperation. And that is the huge concern that I have here.

During his questioning of Associate Attorney General McCallum, Rep. Lungren favorably compared companies' current efforts to preserve their attorney-client privilege with the Bush Administration's recent attempts to invoke and preserve executive privilege:

> If we in the Congress were to every time the President says that there is a reason to protect executive privilege, not only for his administration but for future administrations, that every time he did that he was violating the sense of cooperation that should prevail between two equal branches of government, I think we would be wrong. And I see the Justice Department taking a position that if a corporate defendant or potential defendant refuses to waive that privilege, that is a priori evidence of the fact that they are not cooperating. And that is the problem I really have here...And so I would ask, don't you see the creeping intrusion here? I mean, first you have the first [Holder] memorandum. Now we have the second [Thompson] memorandum, which is a little tighter and a little tougher. And then, following that, you have the Sentencing Commission...[adding privilege waiver language to the Guidelines], well, that is a bad idea...

Rep. Delahunt expressed similar concerns regarding the erosion of the privilege in recent years and questioned Associate Attorney General McCallum's assertion that government-coerced waiver may be necessary to effectively investigate complex corporate frauds. Rep. Delahunt stated:

> You know what I can't understand, Mr. McCallum, is what happened in the past 10 years?... For 20 years of my own professional life...I was a prosecutor. Did a number of sophisticated white collar crime investigations. And, I mean, there are grand juries. There is the use of informants...We knew how to squeeze people without sacrificing or eroding the attorney-client privilege...I just have this very uneasy feeling that it is the easy way to do it...There is a certain level of...why should I have to really exercise myself to secure the truth...I got to tell you something. I am a little annoyed with the Sentencing Commission, too, making this [e.g., privilege waiver] a factor...

At the conclusion of the hearing, Rep. Delahunt summed up the serious concerns that various Subcommittee members had previously expressed regarding governmental privilege waiver policies. In his final comments to Mr. McCallum, Rep. Delahunt explained:

> I think you can probably sense by the questions that have been posed, as well as observations by individual members, that there is a real concern here. And you don't want someone like [Rep.] Lungren from California, you know a far right conservative

> Republican, and [Rep.] Delahunt, this Northeast liberal, filing legislation on this because I think that is the order of magnitude that is being expressed here. So respectfully, that is a message that I think you can bring back to Justice, is that there is concern about the Thompson/McCallum Memorandum. Okay?

The concerns that the members of the House Judiciary Subcommittee expressed during the March 7 hearing are consistent with those previously expressed on November 16, 2005 by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-PA), Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-WI), Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee.[11]

Proposed Changes to the 2004 Privilege Waiver Amendment to the Sentencing Guidelines

In order to stop and reverse the negative consequences resulting from the 2004 privilege waiver amendment to the Guidelines, we urge the Commission to amend the applicable language in the Commentary to Section 8C2.5 of the Guidelines to clarify that waiver of attorney-client privilege and work product protections should not be a factor in determining whether a sentencing reduction under the Guidelines is warranted for cooperation with the government.

To accomplish this, we recommend that the Commission (1) add language to the Commentary clarifying that cooperation only requires the disclosure of "all pertinent non-privileged information known by the organization", (2) delete the existing Commentary language "unless such waiver is necessary in order to provide timely and thorough disclosure of all pertinent information known to the organization", and (3) make the other minor wording changes in the Commentary outlined below.

If our recommendations were adopted, the relevant portion of the Commentary would read as follows[12]:

> "12. To qualify for a reduction under subsection (g)(1) or (g)(2), cooperation must be both timely and thorough. To be timely, the cooperation must begin essentially at the same time as the organization is officially notified of a criminal investigation. To be thorough, the cooperation should include the disclosure of all pertinent non-privileged information known by the organization. A prime test of whether the organization has disclosed all pertinent non-privileged information is whether the information is sufficient for law enforcement personnel to identify the nature and extent of the offense and the individual(s) responsible for the criminal conduct. However, the cooperation to be measured is the cooperation of the organization itself, not the cooperation of individuals within the organization. If, because of the lack of cooperation of particular individual(s), neither the organization nor law enforcement personnel are able to identify the culpable individual(s) within the organization

[11] On November 16, 2005, Sen. Specter and Rep. Sensenbrenner spoke at a conference dealing with the erosion of the attorney-client privilege that was sponsored by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the ABA, the ACC, the NACDL, and the American Civil Liberties Union. A transcript of Sen. Specter's comments and Rep. Sensenbrenner's prepared statement are available online at http://www.abanet.org/poladv/acpriv_transcriptofsenspecter11-16-05.pdf and http://www.abanet.org/poladv/acprivsensenbrenner11-16-05.pdf, respectively.

BACKGROUND

The coalition of organizations listed above[2] believes that the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine as applied in the corporate context are vital protections that serve society's interests and protect clients' Constitutional rights to counsel. The attorney-client privilege is fundamental to fairness and balance in our justice system and essential to corporate compliance regimes. Without reliable privilege protections, executives and other employees will be discouraged from asking difficult questions or seeking guidance regarding the most sensitive situations. Without meaningful privilege protections, lawyers are more likely to be excluded from operating in a preventive (rather than reactive) manner. In today's complex business environment, it is increasingly important to encourage business executives and even line managers to regularly – and without any hesitation – engage their lawyers in open discussions about anything that concerns them in furtherance of assuring the corporation's legal health. It is our belief that attorney-client communications, and the confidentiality that fosters those communications, are more important than ever, and laudably serve society's and our legal system's public policy goals.

Our coalition has been very active in protecting the attorney-client privilege in the corporate context from [2] The American Bar Association has also expressed similar views to Congress and the U.S. Sentencing Commission regarding the importance of preserving the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine and protecting them from federal governmental policies and practices that now seriously threaten to erode these fundamental rights. The ABA has also worked in close cooperation with the coalition in the preparation and distribution of the surveys referenced in this document.

governmental policies and practices whose daily applications, we believe, erode the privilege. Our work has been advanced through educational programs, study groups and task forces, and various filings, communications, meetings, and testimony before authoritative bodies examining privilege erosions.[3]

In March of 2005, in response to increasing concerns expressed by in-house counsel and outside criminal defense counsel regarding their experiences with the policies and practices just noted, coalition members asked their respective constituencies to complete an online survey titled: "Is the Attorney-Client Privilege Under Attack?"[4] According to the survey, approximately one-third of the survey respondents had personally experienced some kind of privilege erosion. This powerful finding offered some of the first empirical evidence documenting the difficulty – indeed, the Hobson's Choice – that corporate clients confront when the government begins an investigation into an allegation of wrongdoing and presumes that confidentiality should be waived, or when company auditors demand access to confidential information in order to certify the company's books. The 2005 survey also found that: 1) clients may be increasingly unwilling to rely on the long-established protections of the confidentiality of their lawyer's counsel (affirming the logic of the US Supreme Court's insight that "an uncertain privilege is no privilege at all"[5]); 2) companies that refuse to waive their privileges suffer consequences (being labeled uncooperative or obstructionist, even if they fully cooperated with every other legitimate request of the investigator); and 3) contrary to the claims of many prosecutors and other regulators, privilege waiver demands are neither uncommon nor rarely exercised.

On November 15, 2005, the results of this survey were presented to the United States Sentencing Commission, which had begun to re-examine the commentary language regarding privilege that the Commission had inserted into Chapter 8 of the guidelines in the 2004 amendment process.[6] At that hearing, the Commission asked coalition members to help to gather additional information and data regarding the frequency with which governmental entities have been requesting that businesses waive their attorney-client and work product protections as a condition for cooperation credit, as well as the effects of these waiver requests. In response to that and similar requests for more detailed information about the erosion of the privilege, our coalition undertook a second, more detailed survey, and obtained an even greater response rate (more than 1,200) from our constituents. We are pleased to present the findings of this second survey, which was designed to capture more detailed information about government and auditor requests and implicit expectations for privilege and work product waivers.[7]

[3] Representatives from all of the organizations listed here have participated in previous testimony before the US Sentencing Commission on this issue, some both prior and subsequent to the Commission's 2004 adoption of new commentary language on privilege in Chapter 8, which our organizations find offensive (see, most recently, http://www.ussc.gov/AGENDAS/agd11_05.htm). Please visit each organization's website or contact their staff for more information on educational programs, resources, and additional advocacy (including communication with Congressional leaders and their staffs, the Department of Justice, Securities & Exchange Commission, Public Company Accounting and Oversight Board, and others), which our organizations have engaged in to seek better protection of the attorney-client privilege.

[6] The USSC Commentary to Section 8C2.5 (adopted in November of 2004) states that "waiver of attorney-client privilege and of work product protections is not a prerequisite to a reduction in culpability score [for cooperation with the government]...unless such waiver is necessary in order to provide timely and thorough disclosure of all pertinent information known to the organization." It is our position that the exception listed in the latter part of that sentence swallows the rule. Under this exception, prosecutors are free to make routine requests for waivers, and organizations will be forced routinely to grant them, because there is no obvious method by which the corporation can challenge the government's assertion that waiver is "necessary."

[7] In January 2006, the Association of Corporate Counsel directly contacted approximately 4,700 members, whose titles included the words either "general counsel" or "chief legal officer," requesting them to complete this web-based survey. The web link to the survey was also made available to the coalition partners offering this summary and the ABA Task Force on Attorney-Client

Survey Results

We prepared two surveys with virtually identical questions except for some minor wording changes that reflected that one survey was for in-house counsel and one was for outside counsel.[8] Section I summarizes key themes emerging from the survey. Section II shows information on respondent demographics. Section III summarizes results shared by companies who have experienced government expectations to waive attorney-client privilege or work product protections and/or expectations regarding other employee actions. Section IV summarizes themes that emerged from the open-ended questions on situational experiences regarding privilege waiver and additional commentary on privilege erosion. Quotes from survey respondents are also interspersed throughout the text as illustrations of the points made.

I. KEY THEMES (additional discussion follows)

- A Government Culture of Waiver Exists: Almost 75% of both inside and outside counsel who responded to this question expressed agreement (almost 40% agreeing strongly) with a statement that a "'culture of waiver' has evolved in which governmental agencies believe it is reasonable and appropriate for them to expect a company under investigation to broadly waive attorney-client privilege or work product protections." (Only 1% of inside counsel and 2.5 % of outside counsel disagreed with the statement.)
- Waiver is a Condition of Cooperation: Fifty-two percent of in-house respondents and 59% of outside respondents confirmed that they believe that there has been a marked increase in waiver requests as a condition of cooperation. Consistent with that finding, roughly half of all investigations or other inquiries experienced by survey respondents resulted in privilege waivers.
- 'Government Expectation'[9] of Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege Confirmed: Of the respondents who confirmed that they or their clients had been subject to investigation in the last five years, approximately 30% of in-house respondents and 51% of outside respondents said that the Privilege, which in turn publicized it to the many groups participating in the Task Force's endeavors. The survey was "open" for approximately 2 weeks. Five hundred sixty-six of the 676 responses to the in-house version of the survey were received from the Association of Corporate Counsel emailing to 4,700 general counsel members; the remaining corporate counsel responses are from contacts initiated by the other groups. Also in January, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers emailed the web link for the survey to its 13,000 members. NACDL also posted the web link for the survey on its listserv for white collar practitioners, which has approximately 1,200 subscribers. The survey was also made available to approximately 5,000 members of the Business Law and Criminal Justice sections of the American Bar Association. Five hundred thirty-eight outside counsel responded to this survey.

Both surveys included 23 questions primarily seeking specific responses to multiple choice or yes/no questions, with 4 open-ended questions at the end seeking text responses with additional detail on situational experiences. Since the open-ended questions were not mandatory and did not "apply" to those who said they'd had no occasion to run into a privilege erosion situation, the number of responses to those questions was not as robust.

This document offers the survey results in numbers and percentages that are approximated by rounding to the nearest whole integer. Summaries of broad themes and quotations drawn from the open-ended text responses are also included, but not all responses to those questions are included out a concern for confidentiality and to avoid unnecessary repetition. We believe the survey's response rate can be considered robust; but since we are not an independent surveying company or statisticians, we can make no proffer that the sampling is statistically significant or representative of the entire profession. We can note that statisticians have designated the Association of Corporate Counsel's membership as statistically representative of the entire in-house legal profession.

[8] The majority of differences between the two surveys were in the information requested in the respondent demographic information categories, and in general question phrasing such as "your company" for the in-house lawyers, and "your client(s)" for the outside lawyers. No "substantive" differences between the surveys' questions exists. If you would like a copy of the questions asked on these surveys, please contact Susan Hackett at hackett@acca.com.

[9] The survey defined 'government expectation' of waiver as a demand, suggestion, inquiry or other showing of expectation by the government that the company should waive the attorney-client privilege.

government expected waiver in order to engage in bargaining or to be eligible to receive more favorable treatment.

- Prosecutors Typically Request Privilege Waiver – It Is Rarely "Inferred" by Counsel: Of those who have been investigated, 55% of outside counsel responded that waiver of the attorney-client privilege was requested by enforcement officials either directly or indirectly. Twenty-seven percent of in-house counsel confirmed this to be true.[10] Only 8% percent of outside counsel and 3% of in-house counsel said that they "inferred it was expected."
- DOJ Policies Rank First, and Sentencing Guidelines Second, Among the Reasons Given For Waiver Demands: Outside counsel indicated that the Thompson/Holder/McCallum Memoranda are cited most frequently when a reason for waiver is provided by an enforcement official, and the Sentencing Guidelines are cited second. In-house counsel placed the Guidelines third, behind "a quick and efficient resolution of the matter," and DOJ policies (Thompson/Holder/McCallum), respectively.
- Third Party Civil Suits Among Top Consequences of Government Investigations: Fifteen percent of companies that experienced a governmental investigation within the past 5 years indicated that the investigation generated related third-party civil suits (such as private antitrust suits or derivative securities law suits). Of the eight response options that asked respondents to list the ultimate consequences of their clients' investigations, related third-party civil suits rated third for in-house lawyers. The first and second most common outcomes for in-house counsel were that the government decided not to pursue the matter further (24%), or that the company engaged in a civil settlement with the government to avoid further prosecution (18%). For outside counsel, the most cited outcome was criminal charges against individual leaders/employees of the company (18%), and a decision by the government not to prosecute (14%). "Related third party civil litigation" finished fifth (for outside counsel respondents) with 12%.

II. RESPONDENT DEMOGRAPHICS

In-house: Almost 90% of the in-house counsel survey respondents were General Counsel. Approximately 40% indicated that the government (federal or state) had initiated some form of investigation into allegations of wrongdoing at their company during the past 5 years. Below is a summary of information on the in-house counsel respondent demographics.

- Company Type: Fifty-one percent of the respondents indicated their companies were privately-held/owned; 35% said their companies were publicly-traded but not in the Fortune 500; and 9% of respondents worked for non-profits. Quasi-governmental entities and Fortune-ranked companies each represented 1% of the survey respondents, and less than 1% of the respondents said they worked for FTSE 200 companies.
- Industry Group: Respondents were asked to identify the primary industry that best describes their client company's main line of business and were given 22 response options. The top three industries selected were: Finance and Insurance (18%), Manufacturing (13%), and Information Technology (11%).
- Size of Law Department: Almost 90% of respondents had law departments of less than 20 lawyers: 33% were solo practitioners, 46% had offices of 2-7 lawyers, and 10% had offices of 8-19 lawyers. Of the remaining respondents, approximately 4% had law departments of over 100 lawyers, and less than 1% had law departments of over 500 lawyers.

These demographics are significant in that they show that even among a general population of company counsel, almost half have experienced some kind of privilege erosion. The vast majority of these respondents who experienced privilege erosions do not work for mega-corporations with extremely high visibility and the potential for "blockbuster" failures; they work for a wide variety of differently-sized businesses, representing the full spectrum of industries. While the companies participating in the survey are obviously large enough to afford full-time in-house counsel staff, only 1% of those responding worked for Fortune 1000 employer/clients, and three-quarters work in departments with fewer than 8 lawyers. We conclude that this sampling represents a breadth of experience from the "norm" of corporate America, and not just the perspective of the biggest companies, where the stakes and publicity attendant to the most prominent governance failures may attract disproportionate attention or be perceived as requiring "setting an example" responses.

Outside counsel: Seventy-one percent of those who answered the survey for outside counsel were partners in law firms, and 40% practiced criminal litigation as their primary area of concentration (26% indicated civil litigation and 20% indicated transactional work as their primary practice areas). Sixty-three percent represented companies that had been subject to a criminal or enforcement investigation in the last five years. Further demographics show:

- Client Type: Results were distributed in the following categories: Privately-held or -owned with revenues of less than $200 million annually (22%); individual officers or employees of organizations (20%); publicly traded companies with more than $1 billion in annual revenue (12%); publicly traded companies with between $500 million and $1 billion in annual revenue (11%).
- Size of Law Practice: Thirty-five percent of respondents worked for firms of between 2 and 20 lawyers. The rest of the responses were fairly evenly distributed among the following categories: solo (19%); 21-100 lawyers (17%); 101-500 lawyers (15%); more than 500 lawyers (14%).

As with the results of the survey of in-house counsel, these answers indicate that among a general population of outside counsel with a wide array of experience, both in terms of the types of law that they practice and the types of clients that they represent, 51% indicate that they experienced a demand, suggestion, inquiry, or other expectation of waiver by the government. A commanding 73% agree that a culture of waiver has evolved with respect to the corporate attorney-client privilege. The sizable plurality of lawyers who answered this survey represented either smaller, privately held companies or individuals—thus belying the conclusion that waiver requests, demands, and expectations are a problem only for large, publicly-traded companies who are at the center of "headline" scandals.

III. SUMMARY OF WAIVER EXPECTATIONS AND EXPERIENCES

> "Whether to waive the privilege has not been subject to discussion; the only question is how far the waiver will go. And, thus far, there appears to be no limit." (Response to in-house counsel survey)

> "I think the forced waiver and related policies have become a problem of Constitutional proportions. There are many examples of government pressuring companies to waive privileges, stop advancing legal fees, and make statements against employees, under pain of corporate destruction. ... When I was a prosecutor, we recognized that big white collar cases are hard and that they should be. Now, the attitude seems to have changed, and if the corporation does not partner with the government to prosecute individuals, the government views it as obstruction. This view is becoming part of the culture, having begun with the Thompson, Holder, and USSG pronouncements. It's simply wrong ...."

(Response to outside counsel survey.)

A. Experiences relating to waiver

Almost 60% of respondents identified government expectations of waiver of attorney-client privilege/communications as relevant to their personal experience with their clients. Of those respondents, almost 30% confirmed that they experienced a government expectation that the company should waive the attorney-client privilege if it wanted to engage in any form of bargaining or receive more favorable treatment from the government's officials.

Almost 23% of respondents said that a question regarding government expectations for waiver of work product protections was applicable to their situations. Of those respondents, around 45% said their clients had experienced a governmental expectation of waiver of work product protections if the company wanted to engage in bargaining or receive more favorable treatment.

Responses regarding these experiences, including which agencies indicated an expectation of waiver, how these expectations were expressed, the type of requested material, justifications for waiver requests, and whether companies waived are summarized below.

1. AGENCIES REQUESTING WAIVER

For both in-house and outside counsel, the U.S. Attorneys' Offices were identified as the government agency that most often indicated an expectation of waiver. The survey asked respondents to identify which agencies indicated an expectation of waiver and were given a choice of seven enumerated agencies/categories of agencies, as well as the opportunity to state that the question did not apply or to write-in a response. (About one-third of the in-house respondents and one-fourth of outside counsel respondents indicated that this question was not applicable.) The top agencies/categories identified as most often expecting waiver (in descending order) were:

In-house counsel	Outside counsel
▪ U.S. Attorneys' Office	▪ U.S. Attorneys' Office
▪ SEC	▪ Department of Justice – 'Main' (e.g., Antritrust or Criminal Fraud)
▪ Department of Justice-'Main' (e.g., Antitrust or Criminal Fraud)	▪ SEC
▪ Other Federal Agencies (e.g., DOL, EPA, HHS, FEC, etc.)	▪ Other Federal Agencies (e.g., DOL, EPA, HHS, FEC, etc.)
▪ State Attorneys General Offices	▪ State Attorneys General Offices

"It is clear to me that this has become the 'rage' among prosecutors. ... In effect, prosecutors are overriding the [evidentiary precedent] that the attorney client privilege is to be maintained." (Response to in-house counsel survey)

"[An AUSA told us] that he expected a full investigation and waiver of attorney-client privilege in order for my client to demonstrate that it was cooperating in an investigation into possible wrongdoing, including interviews of my client's outside counsel who provided advice contemporaneous to one of the events the AUSA wanted to investigate. He also expected that we would conduct interviews of foreign personnel not subject to U.S. jurisdiction and obtain documents that had only ever existed in foreign jurisdictions. He described a scorecard method he used ... he defined cooperation as the company conducting a full internal investigation, including interviewing outside counsel, submitting a written report of the investigation to him, and giving full waiver of the attorney-client privilege – and no joint defense agreements with any other person or entity. He said that otherwise he would issue grand jury subpoenas and conduct the full investigation with DOJ resources and it would be much worse for us if he had to do that. This was after he informed us that our company was NOT the target!" (Response to in-house counsel survey)

2. HOW WAIVER EXPECTATIONS WERE EXPRESSED

Respondents were asked how prosecutors or enforcement officials conducting the investigation(s) have indicated that privilege waiver was expected.

Only 11 % of outside counsel who said that their clients had recently been involved in enforcement actions where there was an expectation that their clients would waive privilege said that prosecutors never mentioned waiver as an expectation. Nearly three-quarters (73%) of outside counsel said that the expectation was communicated and not inferred. Of these, 26% said that "waiver was requested in a direct and specific statement, along with an indication that waiver was a condition precedent for the company if it wishes to be considered cooperative." Twenty-one percent indicated that waiver was "requested in an indirect statement that suggested (without explicit statements) that waiver was encouraged and in the company's interests." Only 13% said that waiver was requested directly but without any indication that positive or negative consequences would flow from the decision to waive.

Similarly, 66% of in-house respondents who indicated experience with this issue said that waiver expectations were communicated through direct and specific and/or indirect statements by prosecutors or enforcement officials. When waiver expectations were expressed, these in-house respondents said they were made using direct and specific statements more often than indirect statements. According to in-house counsel, direct statements with an indication that waiver was a condition precedent for the company to be considered cooperative occurred almost twice as often as direct statements indicating generally that positive or negative consequences would flow from the decision.

"The very nature of the self-reporting schema (at use in many federal and state regulatory contexts) is waiver of privileges." (Response to in-house counsel survey)

"My company restated its earnings, after first notifying the SEC that we were about to do so. SEC's Corp Fin referred the matter to Enforcement. During our first meeting with Enforcement, we described the internal investigation we conducted that led to the decision to restate. Enforcement expressed the opinion that 'of course' we would waive privilege as to the investigation report, as a condition of being deemed 'cooperative.'" (Response to in-house counsel survey)

"During an investigation by a state attorney general, we were told that we would be considered uncooperative and would not be able to settle with the agency unless we turned over lawyers' interview notes." (Response to outside counsel survey)

3. KINDS OF MATERIALS REQUESTED IN WAIVER DEMANDS

On a 2:1 basis,[11] in-house counsel who experienced privilege waiver indicated that prosecutors or enforcement officials do not draw distinctions regarding attorney-client privilege and work-product protections and the kinds of materials these privileges protect. Outside counsel concurred with this observation by a margin of 4:3.[12] However, when a distinction is drawn in the course of a government investigation, both in-house and outside counsel respondents indicated again on almost a 2:1 basis[13] that the distinctions were made at the initiative of defense or corporate counsel rather than by the prosecutor or enforcement official.

Respondents were asked about the types of privileged materials requested by the government in connection with attorney-client privilege waiver requests (as opposed to work product waiver requests). A choice of 11 types of possibly privileged materials was provided and respondents could check all that had been requested in their experiences. Respondents could also indicate that the question did not apply and/or include an additional text response.

About 46% of the responses of in-house counsel and 82% of the responses for outside counsel were for choices other than the "n/a" or the write-in category options. Around 90% of both in-house and outside counsel responses (other than the "n/a" group) identified specific types of material that enforcement officials had requested, with around 10% indicating that prosecutors or enforcement officials simply asked for complete waivers without articulating a specific material type.

Materials believed to be protected by attorney-client privilege and identified as most often requested by prosecutors or enforcement officials were (top 3, in descending order, for both categories of respondents):

- Written reports of an internal investigation (16% for outside counsel; 21% for in-house counsel)
- Files and work papers that supported an internal investigation (13% for outside counsel; 18% for in-house counsel)
- Lawyers' interview notes or memos or transcripts of interviews with employees who were targets (13% for outside counsel, a tie with "files and work papers"; 13% for in-house counsel)

For in-house respondents, numbers 4 and 5 were:

- Regular compliance performance reports and audits (11%)
- Notes/oral recollections of privileged conversations with or reports to senior executives, board members, or board committees (10%)

For outside counsel, numbers 4 and 5 were:

[11] 68% versus 31%.

[12] 56% versus 43%.

[13] 66% versus 33 % for outside counsel; 65% versus 34% for in-house counsel.

- Notes/oral recollections of privileged conversations with or reports to senior executives, board members, or board committees (10%)
- Lawyers' interview notes with employees who were not available for interviews by the government or memos/transcripts of the same (8%)

As part of this same question, respondents could also choose three categories of material related to advice of counsel: advice contemporaneous with the conduct being investigated absent the assertion of an advice of counsel defense; same as foregoing but requested after an advice of counsel defense was asserted; and advice relating to the investigation itself (rather than the underlying conduct being investigated). The responses selecting these three types of material comprised around 15% of requests experienced by in-house counsel and 20% of requests experienced by outside counsel. According to outside counsel, enforcement officials only asked for communications with counsel pursuant to the assertion of a company's advice of counsel defense 6% of the time, placing it eighth among nine types of requested material.

Likewise, respondents were asked about the types of protected materials requested by the government in connection with work product waiver requests. Six types of material protected by work-product were listed and respondents could check all that applied. Respondents could also provide a text response. Of the six types, the three most often requested were:

In-house counsel:	Outside counsel:
▪ Results of written internal investigation reports (29%);	▪ Interview memos with witnesses (30%);
▪ Interview memos with witnesses (22%); and	▪ Results of written internal investigation reports (25%); and
▪ Results of reports prepared by non-lawyers or contractors hired to investigate a corporate matter (14%).	▪ Results of reports prepared by non-lawyers or contractors hired to investigate a corporate matter (16%).

> "Usually the government does not justify its request. They want you to make their case for them." (In-house counsel respondent.)

> "In my experience, government enforcement officials simply have no respect for the attorney-client privilege and simply demand it be waived. In some cases, the demand seems to have been driven by sheer laziness and an expectation that we would do all the government's work for them ...." (In-house counsel respondent.)

4. JUSTIFICATIONS PROFFERED FOR WAIVER REQUESTS

Sixty-two percent of in-house respondents and 48% of outside counsel who had been asked to waive indicated that government officials did not give a specific reason to justify their waiver requests. In a question asking for additional details on justifications when they were received, nine possible justifications were provided, as well as the opportunity to indicate that the respondent didn't remember or wished to submit a write-in response. The top "justification responses" follow (in descending order):

In-house counsel:	Outside counsel:
▪ The government said waiver was needed in order to facilitate a quick and efficient resolution of the	▪ The government cited their internal policies sanctioning privilege waiver requests: The Holder, Thompson, or matter/because it would ease their fact-finding process (19%)	McCallum Memoranda (18%)

▪ The government cited their internal policies sanctioning privilege waiver requests: The Holder, Thompson, or McCallum Memoranda (13%)	▪ The government cited the negative impact of non-cooperation by corporations as articulated in the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines (17%)
▪ The government cited the negative impact of non-cooperation by corporations as articulated in the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines (10%)	▪ The government said waiver was needed in order to facilitate a quick and efficient resolution of the matter/because it would ease their fact-finding process (15%)[14]

"US Attorneys indicted my company despite complete cooperation and waivers of [attorney-client and work product] privileges, and despite the fact that only two lower-level employees were indicted." (In-house counsel respondent)

"The Holder/Thompson policy and the Guidelines themselves have created an unintended result. To claim certain material rightfully to be privileged is now a bad thing, only someone hiding something would hide behind it. Waiving is a good thing. The result has lead to such erosion of the concept behind a claim of privilege as to bring shame to whomever would make it." (Outside counsel respondent)

[14] For outside counsel, the next most frequently cited justifications were: (4) privilege did not apply because of a crime-fraud exception (11%); (5) no reasons were offered—the demand was simply made (10%); (6) information protected by privilege was necessary to the investigation (8%). Susan: complete.

"[The Sentencing Guidelines] came up at the first meeting with the US Attorney or the second meeting." (Outside counsel respondent)

"[The Sentencing Guidelines] were mentioned in a not-so-subtle threatening manner." (Outside counsel respondent)

"Prosecutors casually refer to Thompson and the Sentencing Guidelines." (Outside counsel respondent)

"[The Sentencing Guidelines] were specifically discussed as a negotiating tool for a better or for any deal." (Outside counsel respondent)

"[The Sentencing Guidelines] were cited in pre-indictment settings re: possible penalties if no cooperation." (Outside counsel respondent)

"Waiver as an indictator of co-operation under the Guidelines was specifically mentioned." (Outside counsel respondent)

5. WAIVER AND TIMING

Asked whether their clients ever waived the attorney-client privilege, approximately 52% of in-house counsel but only 23% of outside counsel said that they never had occasion to consider the issue (either because they had not been subject to an investigation in the last five years or because waiver was not an issue in any particular representation). When clients did have occasion to consider waiver and decided to waive,[15] the top two of six reasons (for both in-house and outside counsel) that the client decided to do so were:

- Government officials' stated expectations that waiver would be required for the company to be treated as cooperative (37% for outside counsel, 30% for in-house counsel), and
- Government officials' unstated but perceived expectations that the company would not be treated as cooperative if waiver were withheld (27% for outside counsel, 28% for in-house counsel).

In addition, when clients waived, the most frequent point in the process for waiver was during the government's fact-finding process (36% for inside counsel and 27% for outside counsel): waivers were most likely provided at this point when the investigator raised concerns that the investigation could not be completed through gathering non-privileged information. For in-house counsel, the next most frequent point for waiver to occur was during the first meeting or communication with the government: around 26% of waivers at that stage were at the government's request or implicit suggestion, as opposed to 8% which were offered by the client without formal prompting or demand (on the presumption that privilege waivers were expected). For outside counsel, the second-most frequent point for waiver to occur was during the bargaining and charging decision (25.5%). Twenty percent of outside counsel said that the decision to waive was made during the first meeting or communication with the government at the government's suggestion, with and only 11% said waiver was offered without prompting or demand. According to all respondents, about 10% of the waiver decisions were made when the problem first surfaced – before any contact with enforcement officials. Approximately 8% of in-house respondents and 5% of outside counsel indicated that their clients do not assert the privilege.

[15] Eighteen percent of outside counsel and 6% of in-house counsel said that their clients did not waive the privilege but instead asserted their rights when faced with pressure to waive.

> "My experience ... is that government agencies routinely 'blackmail' companies with threats of indictment, fines, etc., in order to get them to waive privilege and take other actions (discharge of employees, and so forth). This was true in my dealings at the federal level with agencies (FTC, for example) as well as with federal and state prosecutors." (In-house counsel respondent)

> "Federal prosecutors in particular have begun to treat waiver as almost synonymous with cooperation." (Outside counsel respondent)

> "The decision by a client to waive the privilege is always agonizing. In part, it has to do with the unexpected ... the law on partial waiver is so unclear, does a decision to waive once ever stop? What will other agencies or third parties do if they get the material? How will an internal investigation ever be conducted in the future if employees feel the company has 'betrayed' them? It's the easy case when the company has identified a discrete problem. When the government seeks this material, however, the extent of the problem is usually not known." (Outside counsel respondent)

B. Experiences relating to employees

Respondents were asked whether the government had ever indicated certain expectations with regard to employees during the course of a governmental investigation. Around 60% of outside counsel indicated that this question applied to their own experiences. (Around 10% of in-house respondents to this question indicated that it applied.) Outside counsel who responded to this question said that they had experienced the following government expectations or demands with regard to employee actions:

- Not advance legal expenses (or agree to reimburse) to a targeted employee (26%);
- Not enter into, or breach, a joint defense agreement with a targeted employee (24%);
- Refuse to share requested documents with a targeted employee (21%)
- Discharge an employee who would not consent to be interviewed by the government (16%)

> "The biggest issue is the pressure that the government puts on companies to terminate employees under investigation (long before any status determination is made) and then not to cover legal fees for loyal employees. A criminal investigation can bankrupt an individual quickly leaving them unemployed and destitute. The government does not want people to have adequate and competent counsel." (Outside counsel respondent)

> "[B]ecause of prosecutor demands for cooperation, corporate attorneys often decline to provide access to key documents critical to prepare a wholly legitimate defense based on actual facts. Government policies are interfering with the defense function, and will lead to increased charges against individuals who should not be charged." (Outside counsel respondent)

"The culture of 'cooperate or be fired' has severely impacted the ability to represent executives in corporate investigations." (Outside counsel respondent)

IV. SUMMARY OF WRITE-IN SITUATIONAL EXPERIENCES AND ADDITIONAL COMMENTARY

As noted above, some of the respondents completed open-ended text questions offered at the end of the survey, in which the survey requested them to provide examples of experiences they'd had with privilege erosion and to provide feedback on the general subject. Highlighted below are a few of the many illuminating responses to these questions.

In-house counsel:

"In connection with a routine SEC investigation we were told that if we did not produce e-mail the matter would be referred to enforcement (i.e., the only wrongdoing would be failure to produce the e-mail – there was no other allegation of misconduct). When we produced our e-mail with a privilege log, we were told that the privilege log was insufficient because it did not describe the content of the e-mails not produced (which on advice of our outside securities counsel, a major law firm, we were advised could serve to waive the privilege). After a conference call in which SEC attorneys advised us that they did not recognize the work product doctrine and that internal compliance investigations were not privileged,' we ended up simply producing most of the e-mails without asserting privilege because 'we had nothing to hide'."

.....

"The company for which I work has commissioned an investigation of alleged accounting improprieties. The investigator is sharing its work with several outside regulators including the SEC and DOJ. All expect, and have received, a great deal of privileged material through this process. Whether to waive the privilege has not been subject to discussion; the only question is how far the waiver will go. And, thus far, there appears to be no limit. From speaking with my in-house counterparts, I know that my experience is not unique."

.....

"Gov[ernment] lawyers and investigators have asked – demanded - that we produce attorney notes of interviews with employees as well as internal studies that constitute work product."

.....

"The government investigated our company starting about four years ago. At the request of the FBI agent, with her suggestion that it would help us to cooperate, we proffered several upper level employees for them to interview... About a year later, the government executed a warrant on our office. They seized an entire closet full of legal documents, most of which were not related to the investigation or appropriately seized under the warrant. They returned copies of all of the documents after numerous requests, but never returned the originals... . Over the next two years, requests were made to interview several employees and repeated requests for information were made. It was repeatedly outright said or implied that cooperation would make things easier for us... Prior to joining this company, I worked for the government. I feel that the government has behaved inappropriately and illegally with respect to this ongoing investigation. They have abused their authority and terrorized our employees...."

"...The real concern goes [to how the] judiciary ... react to and support such activities. Our matter focused on an alleged credit fraud charge that spread from the accused's business to his family and any attorney he had ever engaged. It was as if the government forgot how to spell privilege. They improperly sought and obtained warrants and subpoenas for everything, including protected matters. Eventually the matters were quashed, but only after significant effort."

.....

"We produced the documents because the privilege claim was not beyond doubt and because we wanted to be viewed as cooperative."

.....

"Our general practice is not to waive[] AC or work product protection. However, in circumstances in which a prior opinion of counsel was obtained and an 'advice of counsel' defense exists we will consider waiver of that opinion during the charging decision process."

.....

"We are forced to practice in a world where we cannot expect that any privilege will be respected by government investigators. In addition to a chilling effect on communications with between the client and the lawyer, waiver of privilege subjects companies to disclosure of these materials in litigation, potentially causing grievous harm to the company."

.....

"The assault on privilege seems to me deeply misguided from a long- or medium-term policy standpoint. Counsel serve a critical role in encouraging compliance and transparency. These current policies run a significant risk of chilling attorney client communications in the future which will heighten, rather than reduce, compliance risks. Simply, this is a terrible idea which is solving a problem which doesn't exist - ... agencies can proceed with their investigations on the basis of evidence obtained through [other means]."

"The fear of privilege waiver has curtailed my ability to frankly and strongly direct my colleagues in areas of risk. I can no longer send memos that say: "under no circumstances may you do this," or the like, for fear of reprisal [in the future]. My inability to speak forthrightly forces my advice to be sugar-coated in ways that I believe lessen my power and effectiveness to force others to do the right thing.... When things appear as if they will be highly sensitive, I carefully retain outside counsel, often in matters I could handle better internally, thereby wasting significant not-for-profit dollars because of the government's inappropriate intrusion in this formerly sacrosanct land."

.....

"Outside counsel urge their retention in part because they contend in-house counsel cannot assert the privilege as effectively as outside counsel."

.....

"The privilege was established so persons could seek competent legal advice and thereby understand their rights and obligations under the law. To treat corporations differently creates the specter that companies won't seek appropriate legal advice, as they have no ability to feel confident in the confidentiality of their communications."

.....

"Our corporate strategy is to have in-house counsel active and involved in business deals early and often. We have found that this significantly minimizes the risk that employees engage in questionable behavior. This 'prevention' strategy demands on open dialogue with employees. DOJ demands for waiver have a chilling effect on our employees seeking out in-house counsel to discuss potentially tricky legal situations. We depend on open lines of communication with employees and these are being strained by DOJ's policy and their push to alter the Sentencing Guidelines. We should have policies in place that encourage dialogue with employees. DOJ's waiver push is short sighted and counter productive."

"It is my opinion that the concept of the government asking any person (either individual or corporate) to waive attorney-client privilege in order to facilitate their investigation is a travesty of justice. The attorney-client privilege is there as a means to have open discussions between the client and their attorney regarding all possibilities. To allow for this type of request will merely result in many corporations no longer including in-house counsel in important decision making processes which may in fact lead to even more wrongdoing."

.....

"In my experience, it is remarkably difficult for corporations and their employees to get legal advice in today's environment. There is a clear expectation -- sometimes unspoken, often spoken -- that any communication, privileged or not, will be shared with the government. There is no balancing of the advantages of waiver against the risks, including the company's ability to defend itself in ongoing civil litigation. This puts company counsel in a completely untenable position, unable to give or seek advice freely. The important purposes behind the privilege are simply being ignored."

"I think the government's policy and position that companies should/must waive privilege and threatening criminal sanctions if they refuse to cooperate from the outset is frighteningly wrong, unconstitutional, over-reaching by the government, misguided, and is serving to undermine the efficacy of our system of jurisprudence and the assumption of innocent until proven guilty."

.....

"Reviewing the reports of waivers and requested waivers in the general press and in the legal periodicals has had a chilling effect on my function as general counsel. I warn our senior managers regularly that they should not count on having any privilege regarding their communications with me. We try hard to follow the law at this organization, so criminal prosecution is not a concern. What is a concern is that the continued erosion of privilege in prosecution by state and federal agencies will spill over into the civil arena. We are in a business sector in which litigation is common and the stakes are often very large. The self-censoring I feel compelled to do at this point hinders the company's ability to protect against or plan for anticipated claims."

"While I have not experienced any problems, privilege erosion is a real fear that affects how we do business. A free and open dialogue between counsel (in house and outside) and management is critical to any business, and if the privilege becomes even more endangered, it will have a crippling effect on how we conduct our business."

.....

"As a result of our experiences, we now routinely advise our clients that there is not such thing as information protected by the attorney client privilege. Although I have no belief that the prosecutors requiring the waivers understand what they have done, within a matter of a few years, these attorneys have utterly eviscerated the attorney client privilege and undermined the most important aspect of the attorney client relationship. As a result, instead of advancing the interests of the public, government attorneys have now created a situation where clients are going to be less, not more, forthcoming; a result that will only lead to more corporate misdeeds."

.....

"At this stage, much of the damage is done--one has to conduct affairs, take (or not) notes, write communications and obtain information on the assumption that there will be no protection. In that environment, lawyers are already much less effective in discovering information and counseling compliant conduct."

"That waiver may be just 'a factor' in the determination of cooperation as mitigation under the Guidelines is very little - in fact, no - comfort at all."

.....

"The government is out of control. The Bar and the Judiciary should stand up and recognize this is wrong. Individual companies cannot afford to do it on their own; the stakes are too high."

.....

"We are involved in several investigations/subpoenas/lawsuits in which AGs, DOLs, or other regulators have retained plaintiffs firms and are using their state powers to demand production to those firms of documents we would not produce in discovery. Some of those law firms are paid on contingency basis. They typically ask for investigation reports."

.....

"From discussions with other general counsel, top law firm partners, and reading case law, it appears that failure to "cooperate" with federal investigators will incur their wrath, whether it's obstruction of justice charges, increased fines/penalties, new charges, character assassinations, pressure on a company to terminate an employee, pressure to have a state bar "review" an attorney's conduct, etc. (translation of "cooperate" meaning, waive the privilege and work-product protection and give them everything they ask for; asserting one's rights is seen as trying to defy the federal government). This is frightening (the federal gov[ernment] becoming more like a police state), and just the threat of such action from the feds changes the way attorneys and their clients work together, and changes the defense strategies when handling such issues – all for the worse with regard to the Constitutional and legal rights of individuals and companies. The law becomes a weapon wielded by the feds against the "people," and the protections that people and corporations are entitled to become a meaningless facade."

"It is clear to me that this has become the "rage" among prosecutors. Frankly, if this is to be the expectation of all prosecutors in corporate criminal investigations, then it will essentially eliminate the privilege as to corporations in all of those cases. Indeed the waiver has also become prevalent in grand jury work with individuals in which the prosecutor hints at avoiding target status if the individual will waive his attorney client (and reporter/source) materials. In effect, prosecutors are overriding the legislative decision that the attorney client privilege is to be maintained."

.....

"On more than one occasion in small group meetings with government lawyers, such as in discussions of the requirements and expectations under Sarbanes Oxley, government lawyers have stated in absolute terms that they expect complete, open and full cooperation and that any actions, including assertions of privilege, significantly affect their assessment of culpability, the level of fines or civil or criminal penalties that should apply."

.....

"The attorney/client privilege is critical for clients, because they need to be frank with their attorneys in order to obtain accurate advice. If the privilege is not there or is likely to be waived, the client may not inform its attorneys of all the relevant facts. The heavy-handed "requests" for waiver of the attorney/client privilege, with heavy penalties levied for failure to "cooperate," will undermine the administration of justice in the long run. These requests are not fair or appropriate."

.....

"The DOJ routinely ignores the role of corporate counsel in establishing the ground rules for communications with company employees and the rights of both the company employee and the company of having a company lawyer present during questioning."

.....

"Waiving privilege through coercion is bad policy. It prevents an in-house attorney from advising his/her client the company. It interferes with the company's and employees' rights .... If the government can't make a case without waiver, then perhaps the case isn't that strong. [They already] have a large club they can use to access company records and interview employees, far beyond what is available in civil litigation."

.....

"The balance of power in America now weighs heavily in the hands of government prosecutors. Honest, good companies are scared to challenge government prosecution for fear of being labeled uncooperative and singled out for harsh treatment. See Arthur Andersen for details...oh yeah...they cease to exist."

.....

"Currently, during the course of annual audit by a big 4 public accounting firm, the firm has demanded that the company waive privilege by turning over a legal memorandum prepared by outside tax counsel. The [accountants have] taken the position that their review of the memorandum is "necessary" to complete their Sarbox internal control review. We have been informed that our failure to waive will result in the firm not issuing a clean opinion in connection with our 10K. The firm has cited litigation as support for its position."

"Auditors are asking for privileged information in connection with reviewing the company's accrual of potential or contingent liabilities; opening the door even before investigations start. Need accountant client privilege in addition to attorney client privilege."

.....

"Where we see the most potential for privilege erosion is during our regular interactions with our external auditors who are asking for more and more information impinging on attorney/client privilege..."

.....

"Privilege should be maintained inviolate, and pressure brought to force waiver should be prevented. If a company chooses to waive the privilege it should be purely voluntary and not coerced."

.....

"I believe the issue of government supported waiver of attorney-client privilege and work-product is one of the most critical issues facing in-house companies, and, indeed, companies, today. Waivers will cause non-lawyers to avoid consulting with lawyers because to do so would expose the company to civil and/or criminal prosecution. The net result will be to reduce the effectiveness of counsel, particularly in-house counsel, and, ultimately, increased violations of regulations and rules."

Outside counsel:

Two responses in particular to the long-answer questions in the outside counsel survey are discursive and thoughtful, and merit reproduction in their entirety:

"My practice focuses exclusively on environmental crimes cases most always being conducted out of the Environmental Crimes Section at the DOJ, an office I used to head. For many years now, dating back to the end of the Bush I administration the Section has become increasingly aggressive in demanding a waiver of the privilege, most always excluding materials on strategy, direct advice to the client and mental impressions of the lawyers. Everything else must be turned over. Sometimes explicitly, more often subtly it is expressed that the waiver is a condition for even entering into plea negotiations. In no case have I ever felt that the client received any benefit for the waiver (or for that matter overall cooperation), rather it had evolved over time to be an expectation that the client has to waive. More to the point, any claim of privilege or refusal to waive implies that something is being hidden from the government and that before a case can be concluded, the government must have that information even where it duplicates , for instance, information the government already has in its possession through the grand jury or otherwise. It has become so prevalent as to be casual. To fail to waive is to impede, it is said, often with the suggestion that a decision not to waive is to obstruct. I have been on many panels on this subject and I always hear the gov't representatives describe their request in sterile tones as if there were only infrequent demands for a waiver and then only when there was no other way for the government to obtain the evidence in counsel's possession. Something is missing in the discussion. The give and take with line prosecutors never sounds like the supervisor's view of how and when the demand for waiver takes place. What's more invidious in my view is how the concept of waiver/cooperation has made any suggestion or discussion of the concept of privilege a 'dirty word.' Prosecutors act as if a claim of privilege were an implement of the crime itself or a legal concept without any historical or important basis in our jurisprudential system. To claim a privilege is to force the government to work harder, they want a short cut. And yet, ironically, while I have never felt a client received any credit for waiving, I have also never felt that the material the government obtained from a waiver served any purpose. This has led me to conclude, it is not the actual material the government wants, it simply that the government wants to obtain waiver per se to be able to claim a thorough investigation."

"I was a federal prosecutor for 16 years, in the EDNY (6 years), District of Arizona (2.5 years) and NDCA (7 years) (where I was the Chief of the Criminal Division and the US Attorney (interim appointment) for the last five of those years). I have been in private practice for the past 3 years.

Several US Attorneys' Offices were historically aggressive in demanding waivers, and that practice has become more prevalent, along with demands that companies fire employees who decline to talk to government investigators or who the government believes may have done wrong, even if those employees have not been indicted. The demands from some US Attorneys' Offices have sometimes required an immediate response, without giving the company time to evaluate the demand or distinguish among different documents. For example, one US Attorney's Office accused a client of failing to cooperate because it spent 2 weeks reviewing the documents that would be the subject of the waiver.

Even more troubling, however, is the lack of consideration that government prosecutors have provided to companies that waive privileges. Unlike the Antitrust Division, which has a history of granting amnesty to those companies that waive the privilege and otherwise cooperate, some US Attorneys' Offices demand waivers, demand that companies force executives and employees to be interviewed by the government on pain of termination, and suggest that the company should not pay the legal fees of those employees or officers (on pain of indictment of the company).

These tactics are intended to deprive employees of top legal representation and cause employees to resent the corporation for 'abandoning' them, both attempts by the government to convince those employees to provide damning information about others in the company. While truthful cooperation is in the government's interest, several US Attorneys' Offices have resorted to making false statements to counsel for individual employees and mischaracterizing companies' cooperation in an effort to extract guilty pleas from individuals and from companies.

In addition, some prosecutors, including prosecutors at Main Justice in Washington, D.C., have demanded that companies retain separate 'independent' counsel to conduct internal investigations and turn the results of those investigations over to the government. In my experience, our client declined that demand, recognizing the client might incur the wrath of the prosecutor, because it was unnecessary. Such demands essentially require the companies to conduct the investigation for the government, turn over the results, and then agree to punitive measures for the company.

Finally, prosecutors recognize the difficult position that companies are in when they face criminal prosecution, because of negative public and shareholder reaction and because of possible government debarment. Some prosecutors exploit that fear to obtain information and then use it against the companies to extract unnecessary corporate guilty pleas or deferred prosecution agreements. Prosecutors' primary goal should be to indict individuals who commit crimes; in my experience, prosecutors have failed to give adequate weight to the factors identified in the Thompson memo and have disregarded mitigating factors when the companies do not accede to the prosecutors' version of events."

Other responses by outside counsel follow:

"Environmental enforcement case, handled by DOJ Environmental Crimes Section (ECS) and U.S.Atty. DOJ ECS lawyer made clear that favorable disposition (misdemeanor Water Act and diversion of felony hazardous waste charges) would not occur absent waiver. Produced approximately 80 typed interviews and notes. At other times in the litigation, was suggested that company terminate funding of counsel fees for employees (despite company bylaws authorizing). Demanded that company withdraw from all joint defense agreements in settlement agreement, despite pendency of continuing parallel civil litigation.

Environmental prosecution under Clean Water Act; U.S. Attorney and staff made clear that government decision to prosecute, despite company general cooperation and violation conduct caused by employee contrary to explicit company policy, hinged on company decision not to waive privilege. Govt immunized employee who committed violation then used him against company that had informed employee that pollution violations were contrary to company policy."

"Typical situation: environmental crimes investigation in which the company is invariably expected to turn over its internal investigation. Although DOJ lawyers give lip service to the proposition that waiver is not required to get Thompson Memo cooperation credit, they invariably asked for the information (or the client knew they would invariably ask for the information) in such a manner as to make it plain they would not consider any company that did not waive to be a 'good corporate citizen' deserving of consideration for a charging decision less than 'the most serious readily provable offense.' In fact DOJ and USAO lawyers say the only way they are authorized under DOJ policy to charge less than the most serious readily provable offense is if the company shows it comes within the mitigating categories in the Thompson memo, and invariably waiver of work product and attorney client protections are discussed."

.....

"For all intents and purposes, there is no such thing as an attorney-client privilege or work product protection in a public company. This is true for inside counsel as well as outside counsel. In-house counsel should probably periodically issue a blanket warning to senior executives that they should expect that, in the event of a future governmental investigation, any conversations that would otherwise be viewed as privileged will likely be disclosed to the government. For outside counsel coming in to perform an investigation, we do so now in the expectation that our client will instruct us to turn over all of our materials to the government. We are, as a consequence, also fair game for testimony in class action and other civil cases brought by shareholders. Public companies currently have little choice in this matter and it is likely, at least in my opinion, that executives are beginning to realize that they cannot bring difficult problems to their counsel and receive their advice for fear that advice will be disclosed and decisions will later be second-guessed by the government."

"The AUSA wrote a letter to the company's counsel explicitly stating that whether the company receives any credit for cooperation would be determined by whether it had 'fully' met the factors set forth in the Thompson Memo, including the company's willingness to make a firm commitment to provide the government prompt access to all 'potentially relevant information, including information protected by the attorney-client privilege and work product privilege.'

Shortly thereafter, and even though the company waived privilege and work product with respect to the subject matter of the investigation, the prosecutor complained of a lack of cooperation, and demanded that the parent company's General Counsel, Audit Committee Chairman and CEO meet with him personally so that they could respond directly to his demands. Surprisingly, the company acceded to this request and there were one or more meetings at which the General Counsel (and, I believe) other top executives were lectured by the AUSA in a threatening manner.

As he realized that these pressure tactics were actually working, the AUSA continued to make escalating demands, including a series of demands for virtually unlimited waiver of the attorney-client privilege. When the company's outside counsel pointed out that the company had in fact complied with the Thompson Memo by providing, inter alia, the facts, the identity of witnesses, the documents, voluntary presentations on various issues and even limited waivers of attorney-client privilege, the AUSA apparently concluded that this attorney was an obstructionist and not cooperating."

"When we assert privilege with regard to an independent counsel investigation report, records and recommendations, the government (in my case state attorneys general and state departments of insurance) tells us that we are being uncooperative and unreasonable and that we are the only person who has received such a subpoena that is withholding this kind of information. The state also requests information on the process our client followed to prepare its answers to other questions in the subpoena, including inquiries and analysis done by outside and inside counsel. We have also resisted that (on work product and other grounds) and received the same reply that we are the most unreasonable, uncooperative person in our industry, and that if we want to save the time and money of the government's investigation then we should cooperate."

.....

"The Department of Justice and the CFTC have extorted the energy industry into waiving privileges and paying huge unjustified settlements for "false reporting" trade data to the trade publications."

.....

"While guidelines for various agency voluntary disclosure programs may permit the assertion of privileges, in reality, agents who investigate apparent misconduct, those administering the disclosure programs and government lawyers who evaluate the issue that is the subject of the disclosure clearly expect waiver as a matter of course. Assertions of privilege, in such circumstances, are usually met with raised eyebrows and "tisk-tisks" rather than by direct threats or explicit statements of unfavorable treatment. Corporate clients, in particular, quickly get the message from the regulators and investigators and elect to waive the privilege in expectation favorable treatment in agency and prosecution decision making. The most common privileged material provided to government investigators and lawyers are interview memoranda prepared by counsel."

"Government suspension and debarment and exclusion officials routinely demand that companies disclose internal investigations, including notes, in order to be deemed 'responsible' contractors and receive Federal contracts. Also, Congressional investigators routinely request such waivers. I have not had a serious issue with the Civil Division of the Justice Department. I routinely get this request from Assistant US Attorneys when they are conducting grand jury investigations."

.....

"The government now expects a waiver as their inherent right. In return, almost no credit is given."

.....

"In situations where the government is aware that an investigation has occurred, it has been indicated directly and indirectly that they need all of the gathered information to make a proper assessment elsewise they view any claims of cooperation or truthfulness unacceptable."

.....

"We generally advise clients to be prepared to waive certain privileges when the results of a preliminary investigation uncover a potential violation of law that, absent an affirmative disclosure, could subject the client to increased penalties or a potential qui tam action."

.....

"AUSA stated that asserting the attorney-client privilege was inconsistent with cooperation."

.....

"Corporate counsel are scared, and are the functional equivalent of AUSAs."

.....

"Seems like the guidelines have bred a culture of arrogance in our US attorney's office since the late 1980s. Prosecutors seemed more human and reasonable before."

.....

"The increase in pressure on companies to waive erodes the confidence some clients have in seeking advice from counsel who will then need to cooperate with the government."

.....

"It seems the government has taken the stand that because they are the government the rules do not apply to them and can by force and intimidation take whatever they want."

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE*

Rule 502. Attorney-Client Privilege and Work Product; Waiver By Disclosure

(a) Waiver by disclosure in general. — A person waives an attorney-client privilege or work product protection if that person — or a predecessor while its holder — voluntarily discloses or consents to disclosure of any significant part of the privileged or protected information. The waiver extends to undisclosed information concerning the same subject matter if that undisclosed information ought in fairness to be considered with the disclosed information.

(b) Exceptions in general. — A voluntary disclosure does not operate as a waiver if:

(1) the disclosure is itself privileged or protected;

(2) the disclosure is inadvertent and is made during discovery in federal or state litigation or administrative proceedings — and if the holder of the privilege or work product protection took reasonable precautions to prevent disclosure and took reasonably prompt measures, once the holder knew or should have known of the disclosure, to rectify the error, including (if applicable) following the procedures in Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(5)(B); or

(3) the disclosure is made to a federal, state, or local governmental agency during an investigation by that agency, and is limited to persons involved in the investigation.

(c) Controlling effect of court orders. — Notwithstanding subdivision (a), a court order concerning the preservation or waiver of the attorney-client privilege or work product protection governs its continuing effect on all persons or entities, whether or not they were parties to the matter before the court.

(d) Controlling effect of party agreements. — Notwithstanding subdivision (a), an agreement on the effect of disclosure is binding on the parties to the agreement, but not on other parties unless the agreement is incorporated into a court order.

(e) Included privilege and protection. — As used in this rule:

1) "attorney-client privilege" means the protections provided for confidential attorney-client communications under either federal or state law; and

2) "work product" means the immunity for materials prepared in preparation of litigation as defined in Fed.R.Civ.P. 26 (b) (3) and Fed.R.Crim.P. 16 (a) (2) and (b)(2), as well as the federal common- law and state-enacted provisions or common-law rules providing protection for attorney work product.

Committee Note

This new rule has two major purposes:

1) It resolves some longstanding disputes in the courts about the effect of certain disclosures of material protected by the attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine— specifically those disputes involving inadvertent disclosure and selective waiver.

2) It responds to the widespread complaint that litigation costs for review and protection of material that is privileged or work product have become prohibitive due to the concern that any disclosure of protected information in the course of discovery (however innocent or minimal) will operate as a subject matter waiver of all protected information. This concern is especially troubling in cases involving electronic discovery. See, e.g., Rowe Entertainment, Inc. v. William Morris Agency, 205 F.R.D. 421, 425-26 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) (finding that in a case involving the production of e-mail, the cost of pre-production review for privileged and work product material would cost one defendant $120,000 and another defendant $247,000, and that such review would take months). See also Report to the Judicial Conference Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure by the Advisory Committee on the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, September 2005 at 27 ("The volume of information and the forms in which it is stored make privilege determinations more difficult and privilege review correspondingly more expensive and time-consuming yet less likely to detect all privileged information."); Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228, 244 (D.Md. 2005) (electronic discovery may encompass "millions of documents" and to insist upon "record-by-record pre-production privilege review, on pain of subject matter waiver, would impose upon parties costs of production that bear no proportionality to what is at stake in the litigation").

The rule seeks to provide a predictable, uniform set of standards under which parties can determine the consequences of a disclosure of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine. As part of that predictability, the rule is intended to regulate the consequences of disclosure of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine at both the state and federal level. Parties to litigation need to know, for example, that if they exchange privileged information pursuant to a confidentiality order, the court's order will be enforceable in both state and federal courts. If a federal court's confidentiality order is not enforceable in a state court (or vice versa) then the burdensome costs of privilege review and retention are unlikely to be reduced.

The Committee is well aware that a privilege rule proposed through the rulemaking process cannot bind state courts, and indeed that a rule of privilege cannot take effect through the ordinary rulemaking process. See 28 U.S.C § 2074(b). It is therefore anticipated that Congress must enact this rule directly, through its authority under the Commerce Clause. Cf. Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, 119 Stat. 4, PL 109-2 (relying on Commerce Clause power to regulate state class actions).

Subdivision (a). This subdivision states the general rule that a voluntary disclosure of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product doctrine constitutes a waiver of those protections. See, e.g., United States v. Newell, 315 F.3d 510 (5th Cir. 2002) (client waived the privilege by disclosing communications to other individuals who were not pursuing a common interest). The rule provides, however, that a voluntary disclosure generally results in a waiver only of the information disclosed; a subject matter waiver is reserved for those unusual situations in which fairness requires a further disclosure of related, protected information. See, e.g., In re von Bulow, 828 F.2d 94 (2d Cir. 1987) (disclosure of privileged information in a book did not result in unfairness to the adversary in a litigation, therefore a subject matter waiver was not warranted). The rule thus rejects the result in In re Sealed Case, 877 F.2d 976 (D.C.Cir. 1989), which held that inadvertent disclosure of documents during discovery automatically constituted a subject matter waiver.

The rule governs only waiver by disclosure. Other common-law waiver doctrines may result in a finding of waiver even where there is no disclosure of privileged information or work product. See, e.g., Nguyen v. Excel Corp., 197 F.3d 200 (5th Cir. 1999) (reliance on an advice of counsel defense waives the privilege with respect to attorney-client communications pertinent to that defense); Ryers v. Burleson, 100 F.R.D. 436 (D.D.C. 1983) (allegation of lawyer malpractice constituted a waiver of confidential communications under the circumstances). The rule is not intended to displace or modify federal common law concerning waiver of privilege or work product where no disclosure has been made.

Subdivision (b). This subdivision collects the basic common-law exceptions to waiver by disclosure of attorney-client privilege and work product.

Protected disclosure: Disclosure does not constitute a waiver if the disclosure itself is protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity. For example, if a party privately discloses a privileged communication to another party pursuing a common legal interest, that disclosure is itself protected and the privilege covering the underlying information is not waived. See, e.g., Waller v. Financial Corp. of America, 828 F.2d 579 (9th Cir. 1987) (communications by a client to his lawyer remained privileged where the lawyer shared the communications with codefendants pursuing a common defense); Hodges, Grant & Kaufman v. United States Gov't Dept. of Treasury, 768 F.2d 719, 721 (5th Cir. 1985) (noting that the privilege is not waived "if a privileged communication is shared with a third person who has a common legal interest with respect to the subject matter of the communication"). Similarly, the protection of the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity is not waived if protected information is disclosed by one lawyer to another in a law firm.

Inadvertent disclosure during discovery: Courts are in conflict on whether an inadvertent disclosure of privileged information or work product, made during discovery, constitutes a waiver. A few courts find that a disclosure must be intentional to be a waiver. Most courts find a waiver only if the disclosing party acted carelessly in preserving the privilege and failed to request a return of the information in a timely manner. And a few courts hold that any mistaken disclosure of protected information constitutes waiver without regard to the protections taken to avoid such a disclosure. See generally Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228 (D.Md. 2005) for a discussion of this case law.

The rule opts for the middle ground: inadvertent disclosure of privileged or protected information during discovery constitutes a waiver only if the party did not take reasonable precautions to prevent disclosure and did not make reasonable and prompt efforts to rectify the error. This position is in accord with the majority view on whether inadvertent disclosure is a waiver. See, e.g., Alldread v. City of Grenada, 988 F.2d 1425 (5th Cir. 1993) (governmental attorney-client privilege); Zapata v. IBP, Inc., 175 F.R.D. 574, 576-77 (D. Kan. 1997) (work product); Hydraflow, Inc. v. Enidine, Inc., 145 F.R.D. 626, 637 (W.D.N.Y. 1993) (attorney-client privilege); Edwards v. Whitaker, 868 F.Supp. 226, 229 (M.D. Tenn. 1994) (attorney-client privilege). The rule establishes a compromise between two competing premises. On the one hand, information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity should not be treated lightly. On the other hand, a rule imposing strict liability for an inadvertent disclosure during discovery threatens to impose prohibitive costs for privilege review and retention, especially in cases involving electronic discovery.

Selective waiver: Courts are in conflict on whether disclosure of privileged or protected information to a government agency conducting an investigation of the client constitutes a general waiver of the information disclosed. Most courts have rejected the concept of "selective waiver", holding that waiver of privileged or protected information to a government agency constitutes a waiver for all purposes and to all parties. See, e.g., Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. Republic of the Philippines, 951 F.2d 1414 (3d Cir. 1991). Other courts have held that selective waiver is enforceable if the disclosure is made subject to a confidentiality agreement with the government agency. See, e.g., Teachers Insurance & Annuity Association of America v. Shamrock Broadcasting Co., 521 F. Supp. 638 (S.D.N.Y. 1981). And a few courts have held that disclosure of protected information to the government does not constitute a general waiver, so that the information remains shielded from use by other parties. See, e.g., Diversified Industries, Inc. v. Meredith, 572 F.2d 596 (8th Cir. 1977).

The rule rectifies this conflict by providing that disclosure of protected information to an investigating government agency does not constitute a general waiver of attorney-client privilege or work product protection. A rule protecting selective waiver to investigating government agencies furthers the important policy of cooperation with government agencies, and maximizes the effectiveness and efficiency of government investigations. See In re Columbia/HCA Healthcare Corp. Billing Practices Litigation, 293 F.3d 289, 314 (6th Cir. 2002) (Boggs, J., dissenting) (noting that the "public interest in easing government investigations" justifies a rule that disclosure to government agencies of information protected by the attorney-client privilege or work product immunity does not constitute a waiver to private parties).

The Committee considered whether the protection of selective waiver should be conditioned on obtaining a confidentiality agreement from the government agency. It rejected that condition for a number of reasons. If a confidentiality agreement were a condition to protection, disputes would be likely to arise over whether a particular agreement was sufficiently air-tight to protect against a finding of a general waiver, thus destroying the predictability that is essential to proper administration of the attorney-client privilege and work product immunity. Moreover, a government agency might need to use the information for some purpose and then would find it difficult to be bound by an air-tight confidentiality agreement, however drafted. If such an agreement were nonetheless required to trigger the protection of selective waiver, the policy of furthering cooperation with and efficiency in government investigations would be undermined. Ultimately, the obtaining of a confidentiality agreement has little to do with the underlying policy of furthering cooperation with government agencies that animates the rule. The Committee found it sufficient to condition selective waiver on a finding that the disclosure is limited to persons involved in the investigation.

Subdivision (c). Confidentiality orders are becoming increasingly important in limiting the costs of privilege review and retention, especially in cases involving electronic discovery. See Manual for Complex Litigation Fourth § 11.446 (Federal Judicial Center2004) (noting that fear of the consequences of waiver "may add cost and delay to the discovery process for all sides" and that courts have responded by encouraging counsel "to stipulate at the outset of discovery to a 'nonwaiver' agreement, which they can adopt as a case-management order."). But the utility of a confidentiality order in reducing discovery costs is substantially diminished if it provides no protection outside the particular litigation in which the order is entered. Parties are unlikely to be able to reduce the costs of pre-production review for privilege and work product if the consequence of disclosure is that the information can be used by non-parties to the litigation.

There is some dispute on whether a confidentiality order entered in one case can bind non-parties from asserting waiver by disclosure in a separate litigation. See generally Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228 (D.Md. 2005) for a discussion of this case law. The rule provides that such orders are enforceable against non-parties. As such the rule provides a party with a predictable protection that is necessary to allow that party to limit the prohibitive costs of privilege and work product review and retention.

Subdivision (c) contemplates that the court may order production and guarantee confidentiality under criteria different from those providing exceptions to waiver under subdivision (b). For example, the court order may provide for return of documents without waiver irrespective of the care taken by the disclosing party; the rule contemplates enforcement of "claw-back" and "quick peek" arrangements as a way to avoid the excessive costs of pre-production review for privilege and work product..

Subdivision (d). Subdivision (d) codifies the well-established proposition that parties to litigation can enter an agreement to limit the effect of waiver by disclosure between or among them. See, e.g., Dowd v. Calabrese, 101 F.R.D. 427, 439 (D.D.C. 1984) (no waiver where the parties stipulated in advance that certain testimony at a deposition "would not be deemed to constitute a waiver of the attorney-client or work product privileges"); Zubulake

v. UBS Warburg LLC, 216 F.R.D. 280, 290 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (noting that parties may enter into "so-called 'claw-back' agreements that allow the parties to forego privilege review altogether in favor of an agreement to return inadvertently produced privilege documents"). Of course such an agreement can bind only the parties to the agreement. The rule makes clear that if parties want protection from a finding of waiver by disclosure in a separate litigation, the agreement must be made part of a court order. See Hopson v. City of Baltimore, 232 F.R.D. 228, 238 (D.Md. 2005) (noting that "it is essential to the success of this approach in avoiding waiver that the production of inadvertently produced privileged electronic data must be at the compulsion of the court, rather than solely by the voluntary act of the producing party").

Subdivision (d) contemplates that the parties may agree to production and guarantee confidentiality under criteria different from those providing exceptions to waiver in subdivision (b). For example, the parties may provide for return of documents without waiver irrespective of the care taken by the disclosing party, and may agree to "claw-back" or "quick peek" arrangements to reduce the cost of pre-production review for privilege and work product.

Subdivision (e). This subdivision makes clear that the rule governs waiver by disclosure for the attorney-client privilege and work product immunity under both state and federal law.

The rule's coverage is limited to attorney-client privilege and work product. The limitation in coverage is consistent with the goals of the rule, which are 1) to provide a reasonable limit on the costs of privilege and work product review and retention that are incurred by parties to litigation; and 2) to encourage cooperation with government investigations and reduce the costs of those investigations. These two interests arise mainly, if not exclusively, in the context of disclosure of attorney-client privilege and work product. The operation of waiver by disclosure, as applied to other evidentiary privileges, remains a question of federal common law. Nor does the rule purport to apply to the Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination.

Mary Jo White is Chair of the litigation group of Debevoise & Plimpton LLP. Ms. White's practice concentrates on internal investigations and defense of companies and individuals accused by the government of involvement in white collar corporate crime or SEC and civil securities law violations, and on other major business litigation disputes and crises. Ms. White is a Fellow in the American College of Trial Lawyers, a Fellow in the International Academy of Trial Lawyers, and was named to The National Law Journal's 2002 list of Top 10 Women Litigators. Ms. White served as the United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York from June 1, 1993 until January 7, 2002. Ms. White also served as the first Chairperson of Attorney General Janet Reno's Advisory Committee of United States Attorneys from all over the country. Prior to becoming the United States Attorney in the Southern District of New York, Ms. White served as the First Assistant United States Attorney and Acting United States Attorney in the Eastern District of New York from March 1990 until June 1, 1993.

DOJ_NMG_0143809

Thank for the kind introduction, DR. FRANKEL.

It's a pleasure to be here with you and participate with Judge Braden.

Perspective of trial lawyers spend time before judges.

As a representative of the legal community - I must express my partisular pleasure at spending time today with so many folks whose careers are dedicated to seeking truth and advancing the human condition.

As we all know, that's not exactly how the legal profession has come to be seen in the eyes of many – sadly even within the legal ~~our own~~ profession. closely

There is the story about two lawyers who went through v. contentious case – came to distrust each other and even hate. The judge understandably became ~~just~~ exasperated by it all.

At one point during trial, one of the attorneys couldn't contain himself and, in open court shouted "You are a cheat!" to his opponent.

"And you're a liar!", bellowed the opposition.

Banging his gavel loudly, the judge interjected, "Now that both attorneys have been identified for the record, let's get on with the case."

DOJ_NMG_0143810

And so it is that the legal profession has a less than stellar reputation among many.

From where I sit, that is a very sad thing because -- devoted my career to trying cases +

And –

Bad apples aside –

I continue to see the legal profession as a noble calling, one that is dedicated, much like yours to seeking truth and advancing the human condition

~~Devoted my career to being trying cases.~~

In speaking today, want to share with you my concern that what has happened to my profession in the eyes of so many does not happen to yours as well.

What do I mean?

Want to talk a bit about the role of expert witnesses – and the role of science and ~~medicine~~ in the court room, its use and misuse.

DOJ_NMG_0143811

At one point or another in your career, you are likely to be asked, given your qualifications & expertise, to participate as an expert witness in a court proceeding.

Many of your colleagues make very good livelihoods providing expert testimony

Others supplement their income from universities with lucrative practices in providing such testimony.

And there are many good reasons to participate in the legal process beyond the obvious financial rewards.

As our society becomes increasingly ~~more~~ complex and technologically advanced, courts and jurors increasingly NEED the assistance of expert witnesses

Experts like yourselves provide a critical function in the truth-finding process

DOJ_NMG_0143812

Ensuring that justice is done in individual cases

And the ~~last~~ ~~only~~ opportunity to participate in some aspect of legal process will Pose highly interesting issues that will intrigue some of you.--

~~Many~~ ~~most~~ scientific + social ranging from the balancing the social costs and benefits associated with design of consumer products –

- SW roll over protection v. fun to drive.
- toasters that don't cause fire v too expensive to finding the proper balance in antitrust law between allowing free competition and protecting against monopolistic abuse

~~Abuse of~~

- Many concentration those merge efficient or anticompetitive and ascertaining the right line between compensating for medical malpractice in individual cases while not so draining the resources of doctors that no one wishes to enter the profession

- do we cap awards or not?

Frankly, our legal system NEEDS your expertise in resolving these and many other issues confronting our society ~~today,~~ and the legal profession.

Justice Breyer article p 2: EB said long ago "the age of chivalry is dead." The age of sophists + calculators – perhaps he meant lawyers + expert witnesses – is upon us. And the glory of Europe is ~~[illegible]~~ "flowering of intellectual forces"

We will need it all the more in the future. Ever more complicated and difficult issues associated with science are sure to emerge over the span of your careers + technology

DOJ_NMG_0143813

Like for example how should our legal regime analyze and resolve the profound ethical and technological issues associated with advances in medicine - ranging from cloning new life to treatment and prolongation at the end of life?

- cloning new life?
- stem cells?
- use of med technology to prolong life ~~of near its end~~?

While I encourage you to become involved with the legal system to help us reach rational and compassionate answers to these and other important questions – while I think it is inevitable that science will continue to influence law and legal proceedings more and more – I also want to issue something of a warning.

w/o sounding too ~~[illegible]~~ dire-

If you do not guard carefully your professional and personal standards of intellectual honesty and integrity you will quickly find yourself and your professions in a similar state of disrepute as my profession finds itself today in the eyes of far too many people.

And, frankly, there is reason for concern.

DOJ_NMG_0143814

Take this exchange – an injured plaintiff suing for tort damages being questioned by his own lawyer on direct examination

By Plaintiff's Attorney: What doctor treated you for the injuries you sustained while at work?

By Plaintiff: Dr. Johnson.

Plaintiff's Attorney: And what kind of physician is Dr. Johnson?

Plaintiff: Well, I'm not sure, but I do remember that you said he was a good plaintiff's doctor.

No one wants to be Dr. Johnson.

DOJ_NMG_0143815

But the problem is hardly isolated.

In another case, a leading PHD economist disclosed in his written report that he was being paid $400 per hour. By the time of trial, he reported that he had worked 350 hours. That's $140,000 in fees.

A lot, but not extraordinary given the magnitude of the case.

The witness failed to mention in his report, however, that he also received a "finders fee" from a consulting firm that helped him perform his economic analysis.

Embarrassed at trial to be forced to reveal to the jury that he had received another $150,000 from this finder's fee that he failed to disclose in his report.

How does that make him – and really his entire profession – look?

DOJ_NMG_0143816

Or how about a famous professor who represented that he held an MBA from Harvard Business School ~~under oath~~, when it was later revealed that he held a Master's in Public Administration from the Harvard Kennedy School of Govt.

Some might consider that a peccadillo – but it is enough to tarnish a career for life

Or how about the expert accountant of a major accounting firm who testified that a hospital was not viable as an ongoing business at trial only to be confronted by a report done by others in his firm done for the federal government saying that the firm was unable to assess the viability of the hospital?

Q: Isn't it true that without doing a financial projection you can't render a formal opinion on the viability [of the hospital]?

A: I can have an expert opinion on what the outcome of the hospital would have been....

DOJ_NMG_0143817

witness his own

But later the lawyer hands the firm's prior opinion to the fed' govt

Q: If you could turn to page 2 of the document. "It is impt to note that we have not performed a financial projection of any kind ....and therefore are unable to render a formal opinion as to the [viability of the hospital]"? That was true when your company said it?

And after some haggling, eventually the witness admits that the disclaimer "was part of the deliverable to the client"

DOJ_NMG_0143818

Why do I share these unpleasant war stories?

Two reasons.

First, no one wants to see you or your professions suffer from disrepute in the eyes of the public.

Be rigidly professional in all your dealings in the legal system.

Don't overstate your credentials or understate your compensation when asked.

Don't be induced into taking a position you don't believe is supported by the scientific evidence.

Don't oversell your conclusions or "mold" them to suit a client.

Don't ignore or suppress important caveats or limitation in your testimony before a jury. Admit readily the limitations of your findings.

DOJ_NMG_0143819

Do your homework before rendering a professional opinion in court to the same extent as you would before you publish a piece in a professional journal.

Jurors and judges deserve the same standard of care.

Beware of the temptation of falling into working for one "side" or the other – becoming someone who works strictly for the plaintiff or defense side.

In short, if you bring the same humility, care, and forthrightness to any legal work you take on as you do to your scientific work you will be well served.

DOJ_NMG_0143820

But there's a second reason I tell some of these war stories.

In addn to

Beyond my concern for you, I want to consider more broadly the problem of what my former law partner, Peter Huber, has called "junk science."

Peter, an MIT PHD and former professor there before going to law school, illustrated the point in this way in his book "Galileo's Revenge"

> "So here it is, Mr Professional Witness USA. He works alone or in partnership with a handful of others. He advertises. His clients gradually learn that they can't risk going without him, for the opposition will surely hire his mirror-image clone from the other referral agency. He is neat but not dapper, respectable but not pompous, mature but not senile. ... He sees himself as a team player who helps with trial preparation, assists in the examination of opposing witnesses, advises on new areas of inquiry. He has honed strong, adversarial instincts . . . he can earn hundreds of dollars an hour... Where have we seen this character before? In his employer's office. He is the spit and image of a trial lawyer."

And let me give you an example of the sort of science that has been allowed in our courtrooms.

Suppose a stock price declines after the disclosure of a fraud.

But the stock market independently declines at the same time due to general market forces.

For years, many courts allowed experts to "battle it out" before juries in deciding whether or not to find liability – regardless of whether or not an expert could point to any evidence showing that the stock's decline was CAUSED by stock-specific news or general market forces.

Give you concrete example from a recent case before the Supreme Court

DOJ_NMG_0143822

On Feb 24, 1998, a pharmaceutical co. announced a revenue shortfall for the following year – unrelated to any alleged fraud.

The next day, the company's shares dropped from $39 to $21 – a 47% decline.

NINE months later, the company announced that the FDA had declined to approve its product – an announcement that plaintiffs contend constituted the first public disclosure of a fraud designed to cover up the problems associated with the company's product.

Following this disclosure of the alleged fraud, the price dropped only $2 1/2 per share.

Plaintiffs and their experts never sought damages based on this small price decline. Rather they, demanded damages based on the 47% decline NINE months BEFORE the fraud was disclosed on unrelated news.

DOJ_NMG_0143823

Only this last Term did the Supreme Court finally resolve this issue, holding - perhaps not surprisingly - that the plaintiff and his or her expert must come forward with SOME evidence showing that the price decline was not caused by general market forces! BUT by the ~~d~~ public disclosure of the alleged fraud

What I am getting at here is that as you enter your profession – with so many opportunities before you – you also bear an interest and a responsibility to ensure that your professions are not abused

That members of your professional societies police their own

And that the ethics of your professional societies are enforced

In short –

That "junk science" by your colleagues is not permitted go without scrutiny

Now . . .

To be sure, the legal system has to weed out real from junk science.

DOJ_NMG_0143824

And courts have done much in this regard in recent years.

With the Supreme Court in a line of cases associated with Daubert, setting forth new requirements regarding the use of science in the court room.

• peer review
• testable/verifiable
• ~~connected to facts of case~~
• closely takes aspect of actual facts of case
• vetting before goes to jury

But frankly judges and lawyers cannot ~~achieve this alone~~ address the prob. of junk science alone.

Just as we need you to help us understand the complex and difficult questions that arise in litigation,

We ALSO need scientists to help us monitor and scrutinize themselves to ensure that what we use is QUALITY science, not junk science.

Your professions are, after all in the best position to separate quality from ~~the junk~~ shoddy science

Some professional societies are doing this now.

But as science enters the court room more every day, this issue will grow in importance and the role of you and your professional societies will become more important to ensure that the public continues to hold your professions in the high esteem they enjoy today.

I encourage you to participate in that process.
It is in your prof's interest your interest and, ultimately, the public's interest

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AUG 12 2005

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

FROM: Regina B. Schofield RBS
Assistant Attorney General

SUBJECT: Bullet-resistant Vests

RECEIVED
DEPT OF JUSTICE

EXECUTIVE SECRETARIAT

PURPOSE:

- To provide the Attorney General with a copy of the Third Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities, published by the Office of Justice Programs' National Institute of Justice.
- To seek approval for certain changes to the Bulletproof Vest Partnership program operated by the Office of Justice Programs' Bureau of Justice Assistance and to the requirements of the voluntary body armor compliance testing program of the National Institute of Justice.
- To provide a plan to announce the release of the report and to inform key audiences about the Department's commitment to the safety of our nation's law enforcement officers.

TIMETABLE: As soon as possible.

BACKGROUND:

In November 2003, Attorney General Ashcroft directed the Office of Justice Programs (OJP) to implement a number of priority projects in response to the failure of a body armor vest worn by a police officer in Pennsylvania. Collectively, these projects are known as the Attorney General's Body Armor Safety Initiative and include the examination of new and used Zylon®-based bullet-resistant vests and the review of the National Institute of Justice's (NIJ) existing compliance testing program. NIJ has issued two status reports to the Attorney General containing results from its body armor studies; they are available at https://vests.ojp.gov. NIJ is now transmitting its third report that details the results of ballistics testing and research on Zylon®-containing body armor. NIJ prepared the report in collaboration with its technical partner, the Office of Law Enforcement Standards within the National Institute of Standards and Technology, U.S. Department of Commerce.

The vest worn by the officer in Pennsylvania was manufactured by Second Chance Body Armor, Inc., and contained ballistic-resistant fiber known as Zylon®. Various state Attorneys General have filed suits against Second Chance and Toyobo Co., Ltd. (the manufacturer of Zylon® fiber). On June 22, 2005, Second Chance issued a public statement alleging that penetrations of Zylon® body armor are due to residual acid in Zylon® fibers (essentially attempting to cast liability for the vest failure on the fiber manufacturer). Toyobo has denied these Second Chance allegations.

On June 30, 2005, the Department of Justice filed suit against both Second Chance and Toyobo, alleging, among other things, that the two companies suppressed evidence that the Zylon® fiber degraded substantially faster than expected when exposed to light, heat, and humidity, and sold Zylon®-containing vests to the U.S. government, knowing them to be defective. United States v. Second Chance, et al., CV-No. 04-280 (D.D.C.).

NIJ has now completed ballistic and mechanical properties testing on 103 used Zylon®-containing body armor vests provided by law enforcement agencies across the United States. Sixty of these used vests (58%) were penetrated by at least one round during a six-shot test series. Of the vests that were not penetrated, 91% showed excessive backface deformation, an indicator of the potential blunt trauma experienced by the officer wearing the armor. Only four of the used Zylon®-containing vests met all performance criteria expected under the NIJ standard for new body armor compliance.

Although these results do not conclusively prove that all Zylon®-containing body armor models have performance problems, the results clearly show that used Zylon®-containing body armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic resistance. In addition, the results imply that a visual inspection of a vest and its ballistic panels does not indicate whether a particular piece of Zylon®-containing body armor has maintained its ballistic performance. NIJ is now prepared to announce these results through the Third Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities.

We estimate that 240,000 State and local law enforcement officers have vests that contain Zylon® fibers. Statements by Second Chance and Toyobo, and the various lawsuits against one or both of them, raise (or have failed to remove) significant concerns in the law enforcement community about the safety of these officers. The release of NIJ's third status report is likely to compound these concerns.

The Bureau of Justice Assistance (BJA) is receiving inquiries as to whether its Bulletproof Vest Partnership program (BVP) will pay for the costs of vests to replace those that contain Zylon®. The BVP program is designed to provide a critical resource to State and local law enforcement that otherwise would not be available. The BVP program funds up to 50% of the costs of each vest purchased or replaced by law enforcement applicants. Eligible law enforcement officers include police officers, sheriff deputies, correctional officers, parole and probation agents, prosecutors, and judicial officials. Only body armor models that comply with NIJ requirements may be purchased with BVP program funds. The BVP program regulations, at 28 C.F.R. § 33.101, provide in pertinent part that BJA "will assist your jurisdiction in determining which type of armor vest will best suit your jurisdiction's needs, and will ensure that each armor vest obtained through the program meets the NIJ standard."

RECOMMENDATIONS:

1. A. We recommend the development and implementation by NIJ of a new replacement standard for bullet-resistant body armor, applicable to all manufacturers that participate in the NIJ voluntary compliance testing program, that takes into account not only the performance of new (unused) body armor, but also the potential for degradation in performance over the reasonably expected life of the armor.

APPROVE: _____ Date: _____

DISAPPROVE: _____ Date: _____

OTHER: _____ Date: _____

1. B. Pending completion of the new replacement standard, to aid in ensuring the protection of officers by body armor that maintains its ballistic performance during its entire warranty period, we recommend that NIJ adopt interim requirements for its body armor compliance testing program and issue advisory notices listing materials whose ballistic performance appears to degrade significantly. Pursuant to these steps, models containing any material (such as Zylon®) listed on an NIJ advisory notice would not be compliant, unless their manufacturers provide satisfactory evidence to NIJ that the models will maintain their ballistic performance over their declared warranty period.

APPROVE: _____ Date: _____

DISAPPROVE: _____ Date: _____

OTHER: _____ Date: _____

1. C. We recommend that NIJ prepare within 45 days a detailed plan for assessments of certifications submitted by manufacturers pursuant to NIJ's interim requirements. The assessments will aid in ensuring that body armor models found or deemed compliant with such interim requirements, in fact maintain their ballistic performance during their respective declared warranty periods.

APPROVE: _____ Date: _____

DISAPPROVE: _____ Date: _____

OTHER: _____ Date: _____

2. We recommend that OJP make $33.6 million available to distribute to law enforcement through the BVP Program, to assist in the purchase of vests as follows: $23.6 million from FY05 BVP Program funding and $10 million from OJP deobligated funds. In addition, we recommend that OJP pursue the reprogramming of $17.8 million, from the Police Corps Program, for this purpose.

APPROVE: _____ Date: _____

DISAPPROVE: _____ Date: _____

OTHER: _____ Date: _____

3. We recommend that, until the effective date of the NIJ interim requirements (referred to above), BJA provide that jurisdictions that participate in the BVP program will be ineligible to receive payment for new orders placed for any bullet-resistant body armor models containing any material listed on an NIJ body armor standard advisory notice.

APPROVE: _____ Date: _____

DISAPPROVE: _____ Date: _____

OTHER: _____ Date: _____

4. We recommend that OJP, in conjunction with OIPL, hold a briefing for law enforcement stakeholder group representatives. OJP, in coordination with OLA and JMD, will notify and brief appropriations and authorization staff.

APPROVE: _____ Date: _____

DISAPPROVE: _____ Date: _____

OTHER: _____ Date: _____

5. We recommend that the Attorney General sign the attached letters to the other Cabinet heads, which inform them about the findings of the report and encourage them to share the report with the enforcement units in their departments.

The Honorable

Dear :

I am pleased to provide you with the enclosed Third Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities, prepared by the National Institute of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, Department of Justice, in collaboration with its technical partner, the Office of Law Enforcement Standards, National Institute of Standards and Technology, Department of Commerce.

The report details the results of extensive ballistics testing on body armor made of Zylon fiber. I urge you to review the report carefully, and to share it with your law enforcement and security units, as it contains critical findings that well may bear upon their body armor choices and procurement decisions.

Please direct any questions you may have to Regina B. Schofield, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Justice Programs; she may be reached on 202/307-5933.

Sincerely,

Alberto R. Gonzales
Attorney General

About the National Institute of Justice

NIJ is the research, development, and evaluation agency of the U.S. Department of Justice. NIJ's mission is to advance scientific research, development, and evaluation to enhance the administration of justice and public safety. NIJ's principal authorities are derived from the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, as amended (see 42 U.S.C. §§ 3721–3723), and Title II of the Homeland Security Act of 2002.

The NIJ Director is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The Director establishes the Institute's objectives, guided by the priorities of the Office of Justice Programs, the U.S. Department of Justice, and the needs of the field. The Institute actively solicits the views of criminal justice and other professionals and researchers to inform its search for the knowledge and tools to guide policy and practice.

Strategic Goals

NIJ has seven strategic goals grouped into three categories:

Creating relevant knowledge and tools

1. Partner with State and local practitioners and policymakers to identify social science research and technology needs.
2. Create scientific, relevant, and reliable knowledge—with a particular emphasis on terrorism, violent crime, drugs and crime, cost-effectiveness, and community-based efforts—to enhance the administration of justice and public safety.
3. Develop affordable and effective tools and technologies to enhance the administration of justice and public safety.

Dissemination

4. Disseminate relevant knowledge and information to practitioners and policymakers in an understandable, timely, and concise manner.
5. Act as an honest broker to identify the information, tools, and technologies that respond to the needs of stakeholders.

Agency management

6. Practice fairness and openness in the research and development process.
7. Ensure professionalism, excellence, accountability, cost-effectiveness, and integrity in the management and conduct of NIJ activities and programs.

Program Areas

In addressing these strategic challenges, the Institute is involved in the following program areas: crime control and prevention, including policing; drugs and crime; justice systems and offender behavior, including corrections; violence and victimization; communications and information technologies; critical incident response; investigative and forensic sciences, including DNA; less-than-lethal technologies; officer protection; education and training technologies; testing and standards; technology assistance to law enforcement and corrections agencies; field testing of promising programs; and international crime control.

In addition to sponsoring research and development and technology assistance, NIJ evaluates programs, policies, and technologies. NIJ communicates its research and evaluation findings through conferences and print and electronic media.

Executive Summary

On November 17, 2003, Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the U.S. Department of Justice's Body Armor Safety Initiative in response to concerns from the law enforcement community regarding the effectiveness of body armor in use. These concerns followed the failure of a relatively new Zylon®-based[1] body armor vest worn by a Forest Hills, Pennsylvania, police officer. The Attorney General directed the National Institute of Justice (NIJ) to initiate an examination of Zylon®-based bullet-resistant armor (both new and used), to analyze upgrade kits provided by manufacturers to retrofit Zylon®-based bullet-resistant armors, and to review the existing program by which bullet-resistant armor is tested to determine if the process needs modification.

As part of the Body Armor Safety Initiative, NIJ has issued two status reports to the Attorney General containing results from the body armor studies.[2] The first two status reports highlighted the following findings:

- Ballistic-resistant material, including Zylon®, can degrade due to environmental factors, thus reducing the ballistic resistance safety margin that manufacturers build into their armor designs.
- The ultimate tensile strength[3] of single yarns removed from the rear panel of the Forest Hills armor was up to 30-percent lower than that of yarns from "new" armor supplied by the manufacturer. Artificially-aged armor of the same type that failed in the Forest Hills incident was ballistically tested, but no bullet penetrations occurred.[4]
- The upgrade kits tested did not appear to bring used armor up to the level of performance of new armor. However, used armors with upgrade kits performed better than the used armors alone.

NIJ has now completed ballistic and mechanical properties testing on 103 used Zylon®-containing body armors provided by law enforcement agencies across the United States. Sixty of these used armors (58%) were penetrated by at least one round during a six-shot test series. Of the armors that were not penetrated, 91% had backface deformations in excess of that allowed by [3] Ultimate tensile strength is the maximum stress (force per unit area) that a material, in this case a Zylon® yarn, can withstand prior to failure. All Zylon® yarns were nominally 500 denier; i.e., the yarns did not vary in linear density or effective cross-sectional area.

DOJ_NMG_0143838

the NIJ standard for new armor. Only four of the used Zylon®-containing armors met all performance criteria expected under the NIJ standard for new body armor compliance.

Although these results do not conclusively prove that all Zylon®-containing body armor models have performance problems, the results clearly show that used Zylon®-containing body armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic resistance. In addition, the results imply that a visual inspection of body armor and its ballistic panels does not indicate whether a particular piece of Zylon®-containing body armor has maintained its ballistic performance.

Part of the Body Armor Safety Initiative entailed an applied research component that examined material properties of Zylon® in order to understand the causes of the ballistic failures. Zylon® fibers show a systematic loss in tensile strength, tensile strain, and ballistic performance correlated with the breakage of specific bonds in the chemical structure of the material.

Preliminary findings from the applied research effort indicate that:

- It is likely that the ballistic performance degradation in Zylon®-containing armors is closely related to the chemical changes in poly-p-phenylene benzobisoxazole (PBO), the chemical basis of Zylon® fiber. The breakage of one particular part of the PBO molecule, known as the oxazole ring, correlates with degradation of the mechanical properties of Zylon® fibers. The breakage in the oxazole ring can be monitored using an analysis technique known as Fourier transform infrared (FTIR) spectroscopy.
- Preliminary investigations into Zylon® degradation mechanisms have suggested that oxazole-ring breakage occurs as a result of exposure to both moisture and light.
- When there was no potential for external moisture to contact Zylon® yarns, there was no significant change in the tensile strength of these yarns. External moisture may be necessary to facilitate the degradation of Zylon® fibers.

Based on the direction from the Attorney General and recommendations from the law enforcement community, NIJ has examined its body armor compliance testing program. The current NIJ testing program is based on the ballistic resistance of new armor and does not take into account performance degradation in used armor. NIJ is concerned that Zylon® and other materials may be incorporated into body armor, with minimal understanding of performance degradation that may result from environmental exposures. NIJ's research indicates that its testing program should take into account the possibility of ballistic performance degradation over time.

NIJ intends to adopt interim changes to its body armor compliance testing program, to aid in ensuring that officers are protected by body armor that maintains its ballistic performance during its entire warranty period. These actions are set forth in detail in Section VI of this report. Under the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor, armor models containing PBO (the chemical basis of Zylon®) will not be compliant, unless their manufacturers provide satisfactory evidence to NIJ that the models will maintain their ballistic performance over their declared warranty period.

DOJ_NMG_0143839

All manufacturers will be required to submit information concerning materials used in the construction of any armor submitted for testing.

NIJ will recommend that those who purchase new bullet-resistant body armor select body armor models that comply with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor. A list of models that comply with the requirements will be made available at http://www.justnet.org.

NIJ will also encourage manufacturers to adopt a quality-management system to ensure the consistent construction and performance of NIJ-compliant armor over its warranty period. In the future, NIJ will issue advisories to the field regarding materials used in the construction of body armor that appear to create a risk of death or serious injury as a result of degraded ballistic performance. Any body armor model that contains any material listed in such an advisory will be deemed no longer NIJ-compliant unless and until the manufacturer satisfies NIJ that the model will maintain its ballistic performance over its declared warranty period. NIJ will continue its research and evaluation program to determine what additional modifications to the requirements of NIJ's compliance testing program may be appropriate, to understand better the degradation mechanisms affecting existing or new ballistic materials, and to develop test methods for the ongoing performance of body armor.

NIJ continues to encourage public safety officers to wear their Zylon® - containing armor until it is replaced. Even armor that may have degraded ballistic performance is better than no armor.

I. Introduction

In the summer of 2003, a Forest Hills, Pennsylvania, police officer was shot and seriously injured when a bullet penetrated the front panel of his Second Chance Ultima® armor, an armor made of multiple layers of fabric woven from Zylon® yarn. The incident was the first case reported to the National Institute of Justice (NIJ) in which NIJ-compliant body armor appears to have failed to prevent penetration from a bullet it was designed to defeat. Promptly after learning of this potential armor failure, NIJ initiated a review of the incident to determine the potential causes of failure.

On November 17, 2003, former Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the U.S. Department of Justice's Body Armor Safety Initiative in response to concerns from the law enforcement community regarding the effectiveness of their armor. He directed NIJ to initiate an examination of Zylon®-based bullet-resistant armor (both new and used), to analyze upgrade kits provided by manufacturers to retrofit Zylon®-based bullet-resistant armors, and to review the existing process by which bullet-resistant armor is certified to determine if the process needs modification. To accomplish these goals, NIJ has worked in collaboration with its technical partners, the Office of Law Enforcement Standards at the National Institute of Standards and Technology and the National Law Enforcement and Corrections Technology Center–National.

DOJ_NMG_0143840

Previously, NIJ has issued two status reports to the Attorney General containing results from their body armor studies.[5] The reports, available at https://vests.ojp.gov/index.jsp, contained the following key findings:

- Ballistic-resistant material, including Zylon®, can degrade, thus reducing the ballistic resistance safety margin that manufacturers build into their armor designs. Certain analytical tools and techniques may be available to reveal and measure degradation in Zylon® and other ballistic-resistant fibers.
- The ultimate tensile strength of single yarns removed from the rear panel of the Forest Hills armor were up to 30-percent lower than yarns from "new" armors supplied by Second Chance Body Armor. Armors of the same type that failed in the Forest Hills incident were artificially aged and ballistically tested with the intent of focusing on five major variables that were believed to be potential contributors to the Forest Hills armor penetration. No penetrations were observed during testing. [Note: At the time, no definitive conclusions could be drawn, and efforts continue to explain the cause of the Forest Hills body armor penetration.]
- Upgrade kits did not appear to bring used Second Chance armor up to the level of performance of new Second Chance armor.
- In Phase I testing ("Worst Case Conditions"), 10 of the 18 used Zylon®-containing armors were penetrated by at least one round during the 6-shot ballistic testing series. The findings suggested that there may be degradation occurring in the ballistic-resistant performance of used Zylon®-containing body armor. Because of the small sample size, it was not possible to draw any statistically based conclusions about specific manufacturers, models, service life, or geographical regions.

Toyobo, the manufacturer of Zylon®, has reported that the strength of Zylon® decreases under conditions of high temperature, high humidity, and exposure to ultraviolet (UV) and visible light.[6] To combat the effects of light and humidity, ballistic panels made from Zylon® must be protected.

In addition, several body armor manufacturers have released statements, recalls, and warranty-adjustment notices as a result of Zylon®-related concerns. NIJ has reviewed this publicly available information but has not consulted with manufacturers concerning any specific actions taken by armor manufacturers concerning Zylon®-containing body armor.

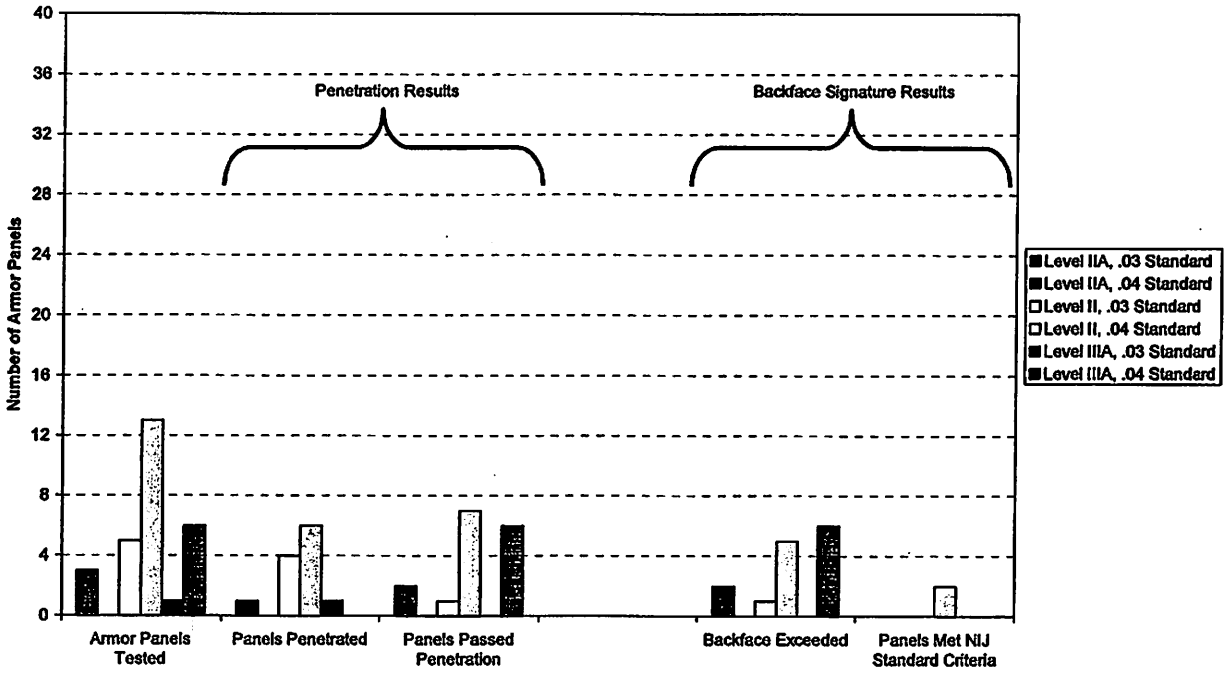
DOJ_NMG_0143841

NIJ has found that over 260 different models of Zylon®-containing ballistic body armor from 16 different manufacturers comply with NIJ's current standard, NIJ Standard–0101.04, or its predecessor, NIJ Standard–0101.03. Preliminary information from the U.S. Department of Justice's Bulletproof Vest Partnership Program indicates that, as of 2003, more than 240,000 Zylon®-containing armors may have been in field use, and information from additional sources suggests the number may have been greater.

This supplement will report on findings from NIJ's broad-based ballistic testing of Zylon®-containing armors obtained from law enforcement agencies across the United States. In addition, this supplement will describe critical findings concerning performance degradation mechanisms of Zylon®-containing armors based on NIJ's applied research.



II. Supplemental Results From Phase I Testing

Since the first two status reports were submitted to the Attorney General, NIJ has tested 10 additional Zylon®-containing armors as part of Phase I of its multiphase test plan. Testing of the 10 armors concludes Phase I of NIJ's Body Armor Safety Initiative.

All of the Zylon®-containing armors tested in Phase I showed a general decline in performance. The front panels from 28 armors (18 originally reported plus the 10 additional armors) were tested with the 6-shot ballistic testing protocol described in the first report to the Attorney General. Penetrations were observed in 12 of the 28 samples (43%). Results are shown in Figure 1 and Appendix A. Backface signature results are presented for armors that passed penetration testing.

NIJ measured the tensile strength of the yarns from 22 of the 28 front armor panels tested in the 6-shot penetration test series. The mean ultimate tensile strength and comparison to a baseline value is shown in Figure 2 and Appendix B. There is no way to know the actual "new armor" yarn tensile strength for each armor panel, so a baseline value of 4.78 GPa[7] was assumed to apply to all woven Zylon® samples. This baseline value was determined on the basis of average tensile strength measurements of yarns that were taken from woven Zylon® fabric. The fabrics were cut from newly constructed Zylon® armor panels that had been manufactured in September 2003 and tensile tested in October 2003. The baseline tensile strength provides some indication of how much tensile strength is lost after the armor has been manufactured. For yarns from the 22 panels studied, ultimate tensile strength losses averaged 41% (with a minimum loss of 11% and a maximum loss of 61%). Reductions in mechanical properties, such as tensile strength, may have a detrimental effect on ballistic performance.

The back panels from the 28 armor samples were subjected to ballistic limit testing.[8] Figure 3 compares these ballistic limit values to baseline ballistic limit values from new armors of the same type (available for 19 of the 28 armor samples tested). The diagonal line in the figure [7] GPa, or gigapascal, is a unit that describes the force exerted over an area.

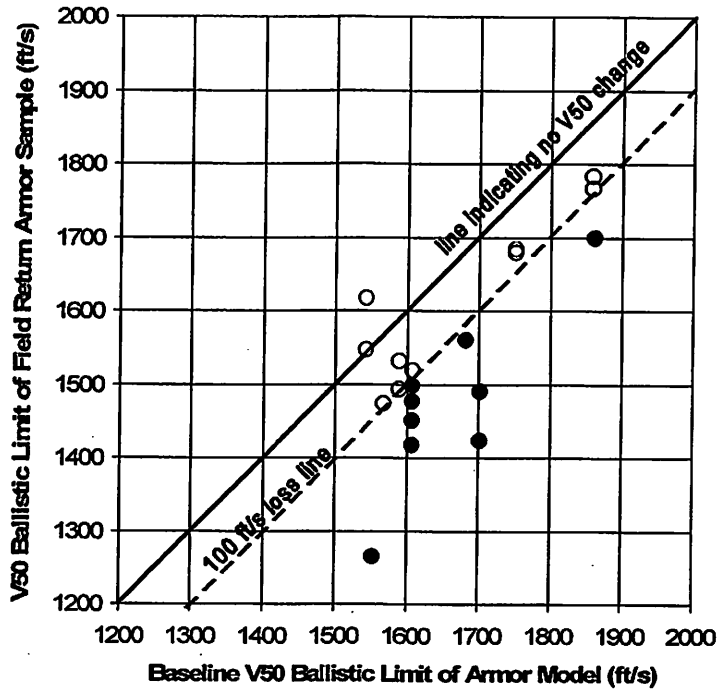
[8] Ballistic limit testing estimates the velocity at which a given bullet is expected to completely penetrate a body armor panel 50 percent of the time. These tests used a conventional full metal jacketed 9-mm bullet weighing approximately 8 grams (124 grains).

DOJ_NMG_0143843



represents the baseline ballistic limit, i.e., the ballistic limit that would be seen if the armor had performed as well as it did when new. Therefore, points above the diagonal line represent improved performance, while points below the line represent degraded performance. Because of the limitations of the ballistic limit test methodology, differences of approximately 100 ft/s are probably not significant, but greater differences suggest a significant loss in performance. Nine of the 19 armors exhibit such a performance loss. Those nine are shown as a shaded red circle in Figure 3.

Conclusions based on Phase I results are limited by several concerns with the test methodology: sample sizes were limited, they were not random, they did not represent the wide variety of models and manufacturers, and the environments to which these armor specimens were exposed are not known. Despite the limitations, these results continue to support the working theory that degradation is occurring in the ballistic performance of used Zylon®-containing armors.

III. Phase II Testing Results

Following the test failures observed in Phase I, NIJ's Phase II test plan was designed to examine the effects of age, climate, and armor design on armor performance. This broad-based testing phase was intended to determine the ongoing performance and reliability of Zylon® body armor in field use based on a statistically representative sample of armors in use by law enforcement. However, this phase was hindered by the lack of available armor to test. The test plan initially called for the evaluation of nearly 500 armor samples, but NIJ was able to obtain less than 80 armors for two primary reasons: first, some major manufacturers of Zylon® armors initiated buyout or replacement programs for many of their Zylon®-containing armor models, which greatly reduced the number of available armors in the field. Second, NIJ found discrepancies between what armor models were believed to be in use and what law enforcement agencies actually had in service.

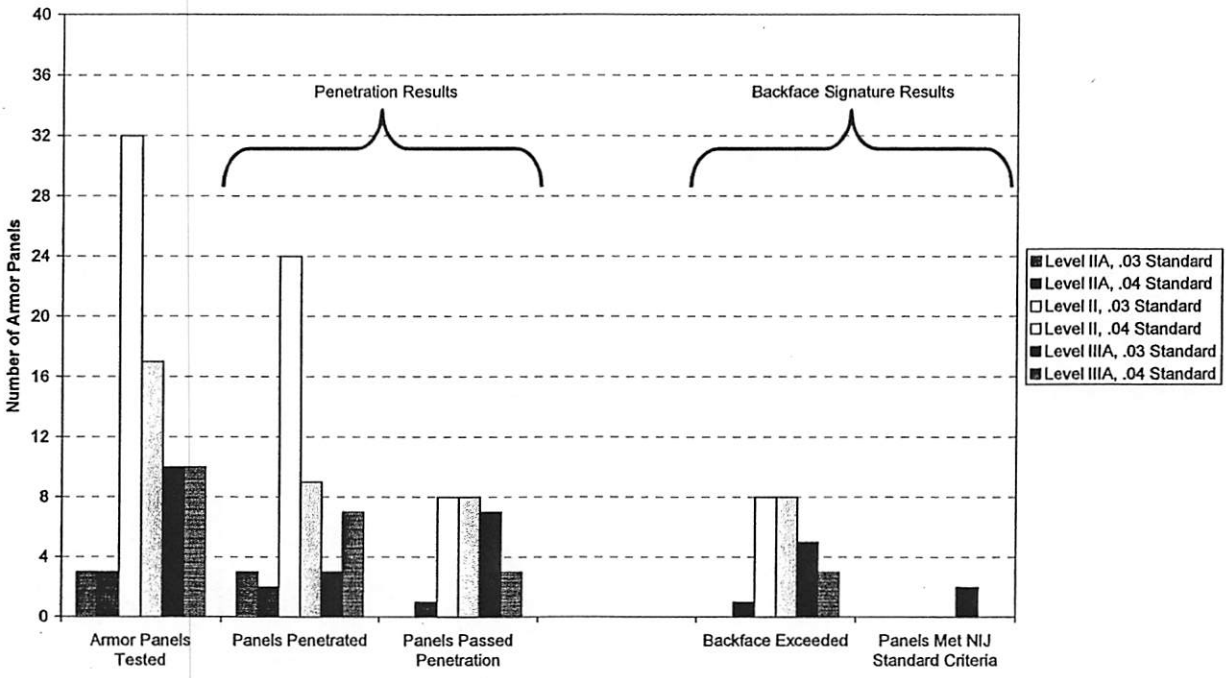
A total of 75 Zylon®-containing body armors were examined during the initial part of Phase II testing. One panel was randomly selected from each armor and subjected to penetration-backface signature[9] (P-BFS) testing in a protocol similar to that used during Phase I testing. Each panel was tested using the two different calibers associated with the armor's classification (Type IIA, Type II, or Type IIIA). Three shots of each caliber consistent with the NIJ Standard were fired (for a total of six shots), with one of the three shots for each caliber fired at a 30-degree impact angle. Unlike Phase I, during the Phase II P-BFS tests, all of the armor panels were tested in a wet condition in accordance with the NIJ standard.

During the final part of Phase II testing, the companion panels will be subjected to ballistic limit testing to determine if, and how much, the ballistic limit has shifted since the armor model was originally tested for compliance to an NIJ standard. Zylon® yarns will be taken from selected armor panels and subjected to tensile testing. These results will be described in a subsequent report.



A large number of the tested armor samples experienced penetrations and/or backface signatures that exceeded the maximum allowable limit of 44 mm (1.73 in) specified in the NIJ standard. Penetrations were observed in 48 of the 75 (64%) armor panels; 34 (45%) were penetrated more than once. Ten of the 75 (13%) armor panels were penetrated by all six rounds. Of the 27 armor panels that were not penetrated, all but two experienced at least one excessive backface signature. Figure 4 shows the number of armors tested from each threat level and test standard and summarizes the results of the P-BFS tests. Appendix C contains the complete results. Appendix D summarizes the data for specific armor types.

While these results do not conclusively prove that all Zylon®-containing body armor models have performance issues, they clearly show that used Zylon®-containing body armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic resistance.

[9] Backface Signature (BFS): when armor is tested, it is mounted on clay backing materials whose consistency is controlled. After the shot, the depth of the clay deformation behind the armor panel is measured and recorded as the BFS.

A. Analysis of Results by Age of Armor

The 75 armors tested in the Phase II P-BFS tests ranged in age from 17 to 71 months. Fifty-three were less than 5 years old, or within the standard warranty period for most body armor (although the warranty period for some of these vests is as low as 30 months). Of these 53 armors, 35 (66%) were penetrated. Twelve armors were between 60 and 70 months old, exceeding the warranty period by up to 10 months. Of these 12 older armors, eight (67%) were penetrated. The age of 10 armors could not be determined; five of the 10 (50%) were penetrated.

Table 1 lists the performance of the tested armors by age. There is no clear correlation between armor age and penetration rate. These results imply that used Zylon®-containing armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic protection, regardless of age, although the number of armors in this data set with less than two years of service life is quite limited.

B. Analysis of Results by Percentage of Zylon® in Armor

The percentage of Zylon® material in the ballistic resistant panels varied greatly between the armor models. For the purposes of this study, the percentage of Zylon® material in a model of armor was calculated by dividing the number of layers in the ballistic panel that were constructed from either woven Zylon® yarns or laminated sheets of Zylon® fibers by the total number of material layers. Four of the armors tested contained less than 15% Zylon®. Of these, none experienced penetrations during testing. No armors were tested that contained between 15% and 25% Zylon®. Three of nine armors containing 25% to 30% Zylon® layers experienced penetrations. For the groups of armors containing more than 30% Zylon®, the penetration rates ranged from 60% to 100%. Table 2 lists the penetration rates for groups of armors with various percentages of Zylon® layers. These results clearly indicate that used armors containing more than a small percentage of Zylon® material are unlikely to reliably provide the intended level of ballistic protection.

C. Analysis of Results by Threat Round

During NIJ compliance testing of levels IIA, II, and IIIA armor, each armor model is shot with two threats: a 9 mm bullet and either a 40 S&W, 357 Magnum, or 44 Magnum bullet (hereafter referred to as the "other" round) depending on the armor's threat level. These threat rounds are intended to subject the armor to both penetrative and blunt trauma threats.

Table 3 lists which threat round penetrated armors for each of the threat levels. Of the 48 armors that were penetrated, 25 were penetrated by both rounds, six by the 9 mm round only, and 17 by the other round only. These results indicate that both threat rounds may be nearly as penetrative. Therefore, both rounds should be considered to determine the ballistic performance of a particular armor.

D. Analysis of Results by Armor Condition

All armors tested as part of the DOJ Body Armor Safety Initiative were visually inspected and given a condition rating that indicated how well worn or damaged the armor was before testing. The condition ratings range from Condition 1 for armor that appeared to be "like new" to Condition 4 for armors that showed signs of extreme wear or abuse. The armors tested during Phase II P-BFS tests ranged from Condition 2 (light to moderate wear) to Condition 4; the vast majority rated Condition 3 (significant wear - daily use for extended period) or Condition 4.

Table 4 lists the test results based on the armor condition rating. More than half the armor in each condition category was penetrated. There appears to be no correlation between condition ratings and performance. The results imply that a visual inspection of the armor and its ballistic panels cannot determine if a particular piece of Zylon®-containing body armor will perform acceptably.

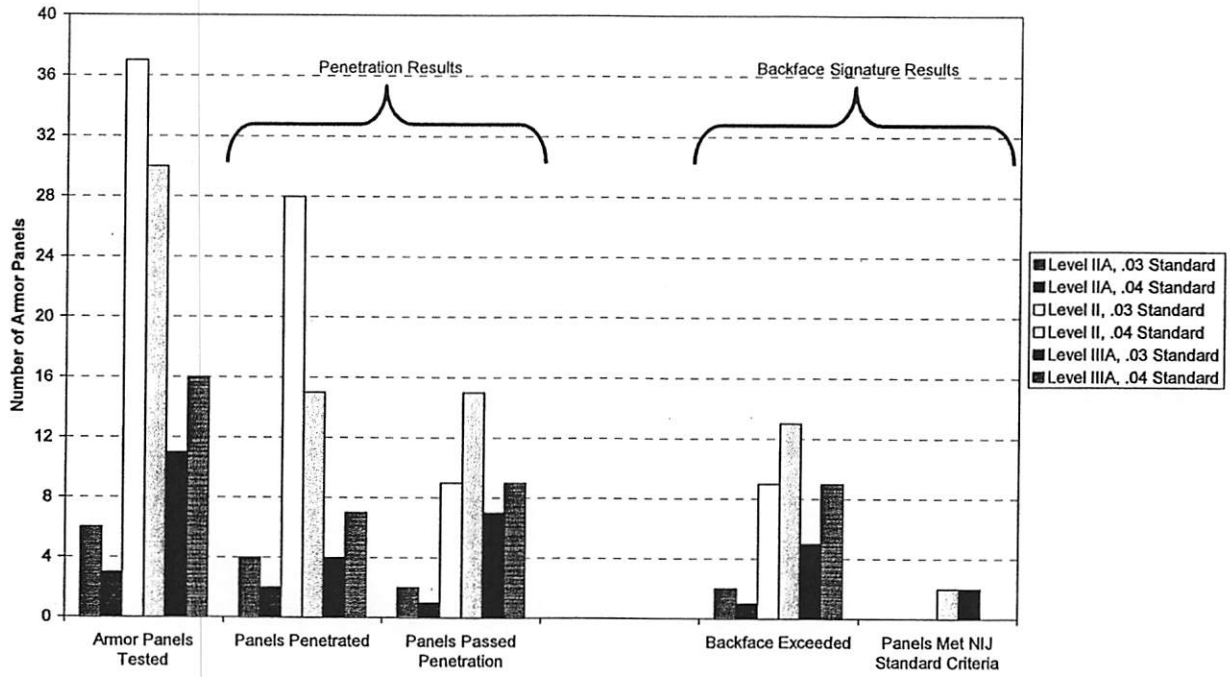
IV. Results of Phase I and Phase II Ballistic Testing

Although the test methodologies and sampling criteria were slightly different between Phase I and Phase II, combined ballistic test results for the 103 Zylon®-containing armor samples demonstrate that much of the used Zylon®-containing armor did not maintain ballistic performance in field use. Table 5 and Figure 5 show the combined test results from Phases I and II. Key findings are:

- Zylon®-containing armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic protection.

DOJ_NMG_0143850



- Ballistic limits of used armor samples were generally less than the original compliance samples. In many cases there were declines in ballistic limit values of 100 ft/s or more.
- Zylon® yarns taken from used armor samples exhibited degraded tensile strength characteristics.
- Age and visual examination did not correlate with demonstrated ballistic performance, thus they appear to be ineffective indicators of potential ballistic performance.
- Of the used armor samples that were not penetrated, nearly all exhibited higher backface signatures than permitted by the NIJ Compliance Testing Program.

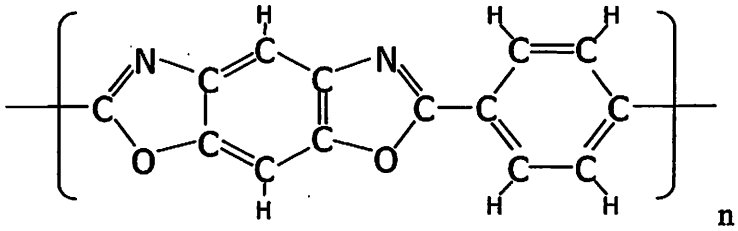
V. Applied Research

While NIJ's examination and testing of used Zylon®-containing body armor does show that there is degradation in performance, it is critical to understand the fundamental nature of Zylon® degradation and how the degradation relates to ballistic performance. To complement the ballistic test program, NIJ initiated a number of applied research activities to:

- Identify analytical techniques for characterizing the chemical, physical, and mechanical properties of PBO and other ballistic materials.
- Determine what factors may contribute to the degradation Zylon® (e.g. heat, humidity, UV and visible light, mechanical stress).
- Correlate changes in chemical and mechanical fiber properties to the performance of ballistic resistant materials.
- Determine if the presence of moisture or other trace materials in the virgin fiber may contribute to performance degradation, even without external influences.
- Determine if an accelerated aging process or other nondestructive processes can be developed to predict and evaluate the ongoing ballistic performance of used body armor.



DOJ_NMG_0143852

The results of the research are documented in a report[10] and a technical paper,[11] both of which will be published shortly. Most of the research described here is ongoing and will be updated as new findings become available. While NIJ's initial research has focused primarily on Zylon®, future phases of this applied research program will examine other ballistic-resistant materials.

The ballistic material called by the trade name Zylon® is also known by its chemical name, poly(p-phenylene benzobisoxazole), or PBO. PBO is a polymer that can be thought of as a long chain of repeat units that are bonded together in a linear arrangement. One repeat unit is depicted in Figure 6. Millions of these polymer chains arrange themselves into a long thin fiber. In some cases the individual fibers are incorporated into nonwoven ballistic resistant fabrics, such as the case with Z Shield®.[12] In other cases, hundreds of these fibers are bundled together to form a yarn, which is then woven into fabric, as is the case with the traditional woven Zylon® fabric.

The chemical structure of PBO provides high thermal stability and outstanding mechanical properties. PBO fibers are extremely strong, tough, and stiff, with certain mechanical properties, such as tensile strength and elastic modulus,[13] that are superior to those of para-aramid fibers (e.g., Kevlar®, Twaron®) or ultra-high molecular weight polyethylene fibers (e.g. Dyneema®, Spectra®).

A number of questions exist concerning the hydrolytic and ultraviolet (UV)-visible light stability of PBO, or described differently, the susceptibility of PBO to degrade when exposed to moisture and light. Toyobo has reported tensile strength degradation of PBO fiber following exposure to heat and moisture[14]. Only a few studies in the peer-reviewed literature provide any data on the hydrolytic stability of PBO in aqueous and acidic conditions.[15] As far back as 1995, researchers at NASA evaluated the chemical resistance of PBO and observed significant losses in tensile strength following immersion in water, hydrochloric acid, nitric acid, sulfuric acid, sodium chloride and sodium hypochlorite.[16]

In general, PBO and similar materials undergo hydrolysis[17] in conditions ranging from neutral to acidic and at ambient as well as elevated temperatures. One study documents the effects of ultraviolet and visible light on PBO fibers, where substantial (> 90 %) loss in tensile strength was observed following harsh UV exposure conditions.[16]

A. Relationship Between Ballistic Capability and Mechanical Properties

This report discusses mechanical properties of fibers, since materials used in textile-based armor systems have certain desirable mechanical properties that relate to ballistic performance. The relationship between mechanical properties and ballistic performance has been established by both experiment and theory. For example, Cunniff empirically demonstrated this relationship by developing a parameter known as U^* that correlates with the ballistic performance[18] of many armor systems.[19] Phoenix and Porwal established a theoretical basis for U^* from first principles modeling of an armor's response to ballistic impact.[20] In addition, a number of experiments have demonstrated good agreement with the ballistic performance predicted using the U^* parameter. The expression for U^* is as follows:

$$U^* = \frac{\sigma_{uts}\varepsilon_f}{2\rho}\sqrt{\frac{E}{\rho}}$$

In this equation, σ_{uts} is the fiber's ultimate tensile strength; , ε is the fiber's ultimate tensile strain, a measure of the amount a fiber stretches before breaking; E is the modulus, a measure of how much a fiber stretches under a load; and ρ is the density of the fiber. Thus, changes in any of these physical properties will change the ballistic performance of a material. The U^* parameter relates changes in certain physical properties of a fiber to the ballistic performance of an armor made from that fiber. Therefore, Cunniff's equation provides a basis for evaluating Zylon® or any other fiber used in body armor.

B. Comparative Analysis of Zylon® from Different Sources

A comparative analysis of PBO materials was performed as part of the applied research effort. The studies used yarn samples from the following sources:

- Officer's armor: The back panel of the Forest Hills officer's armor that was penetrated. The armor was manufactured in November 2002. The front panel, where the bullet penetration occurred, is currently being retained as evidence and could not be obtained for analysis at the time of this writing.
- New armor: A new, unworn armor of the same model and construction as the officer's armor, style SMU-IIA+105130, manufactured in September 2003.
- Archive armor: An armor from the National Law Enforcement and Corrections Technology Center (NLECTC) Compliance Test Program archives, style SMU-IIA+105130, manufactured in March 2001, and submitted for compliance testing in May 2001.
- Virgin yarn: PBO spool yarn, manufactured in August 2003 and provided to the National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) by the fiber manufacturer in May 2004 for this study.

C. Changes in Mechanical Properties of Zylon® Yarn

The mechanical properties of the yarns were measured and compared to virgin yarn. The results are shown in Table 6. The yarns from the officer's armor are clearly lower in tensile strength and tensile strain than the yarns from the new and archive armors, as well as the virgin yarn. The tensile strength of the yarns from the archive armor is also lower than that of the new armor and virgin yarns. When yarn is woven into fabric, there may be as much as 10–20 % loss in tensile strength due to mechanical fiber damage. The difference between the tensile properties of the virgin yarn and the new armor yarn, approximately 10%, may be due to this mechanical damage; however, this type of mechanical damage alone would not explain the further reduction in tensile strength of yarns from the archive vest and the officer's vest.

DOJ_NMG_0143855

Interestingly, the moduli—or stiffness—of the yarns from the three vests are not substantially different. Toyobo previously reported results of environmental conditioning tests on Zylon® fiber.[21] In that report, they stated that the "tensile modulus for Zylon® fiber remains constant" and that "energy dissipation remains constant and extremely high." The results in Table 6 support the first statement, but not the second. The moduli are relatively constant, indicating that the stiffness of the Zylon® yarns from the different vests is about the same, but the energy dissipating characteristics of the yarns are dramatically different, as indicated by the "Energy to Break Point" column in Table 6. Essentially, this quantity is the area under the stress versus strain curve. When the tensile strength and strain at break are each reduced, the energy-absorbing ability of the yarn will also be reduced. In this case, yarns from the officer's vest can absorb only about half of the energy before breaking compared to yarns from the new vest.

Table 6: Tensile Properties of Armor Yarns[22]

Source of Fiber	Tensile Strength (GPa)	Strain at Break (%)	Modulus at Break (GPa)	Energy to Break Point (N m)
Officer	3.22	2.50	136.61	0.31
New	4.78	3.29	141.80	0.61
Archive	3.65	2.65	141.60	0.37

D. Chemical Changes in Zylon® When Examined with Infrared Spectroscopy

A large body of scientific literature reveals that the oxazole ring, the five-member ring that appears within the chemical structure of PBO, has characteristics that cause it to be susceptible to degradation due to moisture and light exposure. Determining if there is scientific evidence of this degradation in real armor samples is important. Fourier transform infrared (FTIR) spectroscopy is a common technique used in crime laboratories. FTIR relies on the fact that different types of chemical bonds preferentially absorb infrared light of different wavelengths, and by measuring which wavelengths are absorbed, a characteristic "spectrum," or fingerprint, for the material being studied can be obtained. By comparing the spectrum to other spectra of known model compounds,[23] the identity of the subject material can be determined.

FTIR has been applied successfully to the effort to measure changes in the oxazole ring and to look for evidence that helps identify the degradation mechanisms. PBO produces an FTIR spectrum similar to that shown in Figure 7. The oxazole ring is circled. Key spectral components are highlighted that correspond to certain bonds on the oxazole ring.

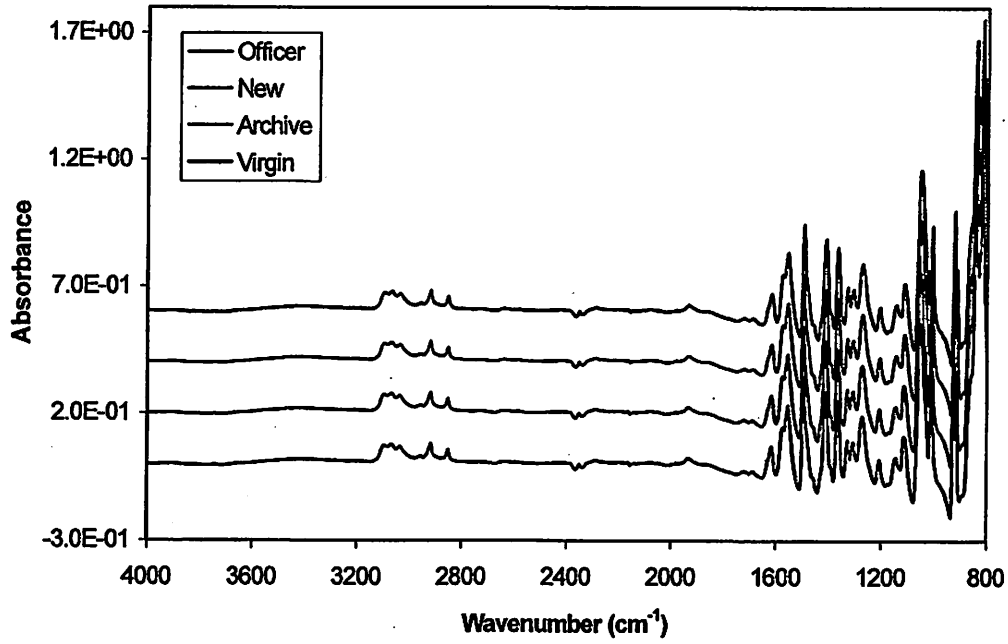
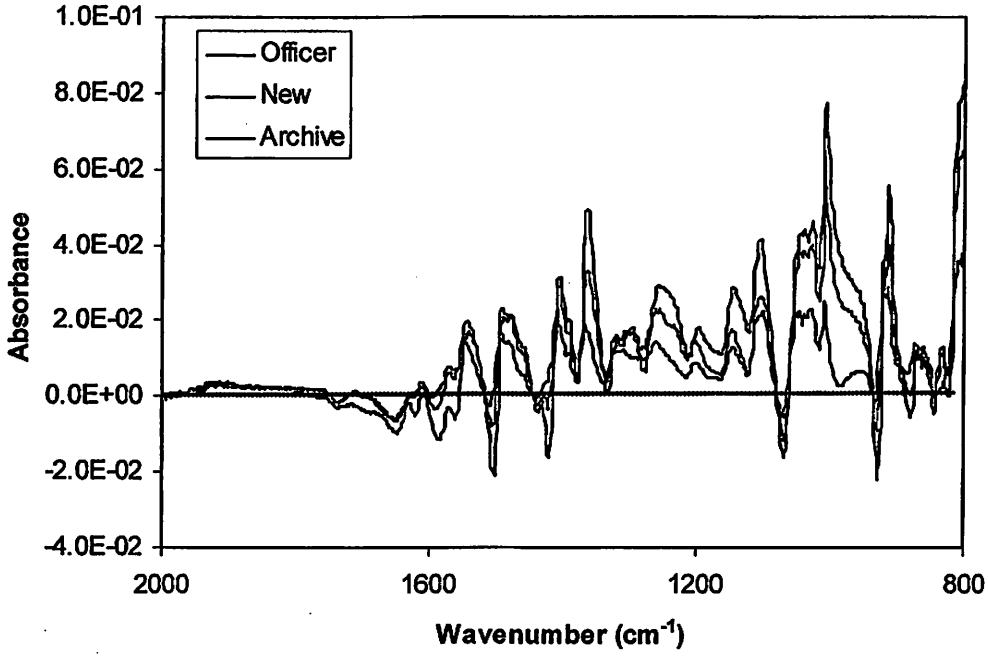
Chemical changes due to polymer degradation are often difficult to detect from a simple visual inspection of the FTIR spectra because the differences in the various peaks and valleys are minor in many cases. Even subtle differences can be indicative of significant chemical changes. Figure 8 demonstrates this: the FTIR spectra from all four yarn samples appear to be the same (the lines are offset from each other vertically to better show their shapes). To solve this problem, the spectrum of each material is subtracted from the spectrum of a control sample. This approach highlights even minor differences between spectra. This technique was validated during the artificial aging process described in Supplement I in which FTIR was used to monitor the progressive breaking of the oxazole ring in PBO over time.



[23] Model compounds are stand-alone compounds that can be an effective method for studying unique characteristics of another compound and for studying small changes that may occur in a complex polymer.

DOJ_NMG_0143857

Figure 9 shows the spectra that result when the FTIR spectrum of the virgin yarn is subtracted from each of the armor yarn spectra. A flat spectral difference line at "0" absorbance would indicate that there are no differences between the virgin yarn control sample and the other sample. Downward-pointing peaks in the spectra indicate chemical bonds that have been lost while upward-pointing peaks are indicative of bonds that have increased. Figure 9 indicates that there is a progressive change. The new vest yarn is most similar to the virgin yarn, the archive vest yarn is next, and the officer's vest yarn is the most changed.



In this study, the FTIR data show that the oxazole ring degraded in the officer's armor yarn compared to unused armor. Thus, it is likely that the ballistic performance degradation in PBO armors is closely related to the chemical changes in the PBO fiber resulting from oxazole ring breakage. This change can be monitored using FTIR, implying that this analysis technique may provide a basis for nondestructive monitoring of ballistic performance.

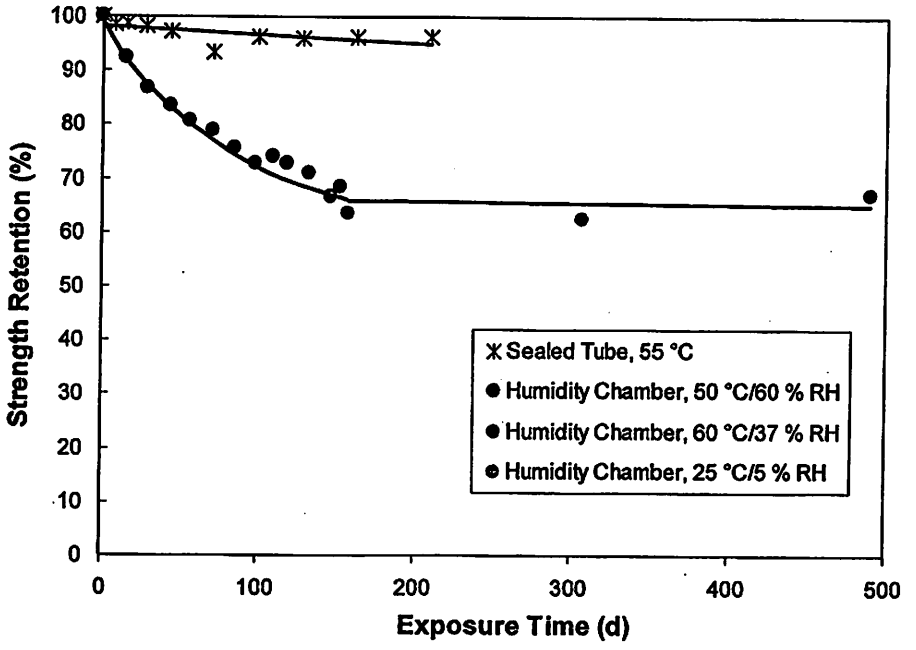
E. Moisture Effect on Armor Degradation

In the Forest Hills study reported previously, new armor was artificially aged in a temperature-humidity chamber. The artificial aging process provided experimental evidence that moisture could drive the degradation of Zylon®-containing body armor. Mechanical properties were monitored to confirm that the new armor panels had been weakened to match the weakened state of the officer's body armor from the Forest Hills incident. Once that weakened state had been achieved, the temperature-humidity chamber was adjusted in an attempt to halt the hydrolysis process. Some of the armor panels that were not used for the Forest Hills ballistics tests remained in the temperature-humidity chamber for an extended period of time. After 157 days, the humidity level was changed to a very low value (5% relative humidity). As seen in Figure 10, the Zylon® yarn tensile strength did not change in low-humidity conditions.



Based on this finding, the following questions were posed: 1) If the Zylon® fiber were prevented from coming into contact with external moisture, would degradation be slowed down or prevented? 2) Is there enough moisture trapped in the Zylon® fiber to promote degradation, even if there were no exposure to external moisture?

To study these questions, virgin Zylon® yarns were placed inside glass tubes, backfilled with argon, and then sealed so that there was no potential for external moisture to contact the yarn. The only moisture present would be moisture that was initially present in the fiber structure or on the fiber surface. This would represent the "ideal" if one could effect a perfect hermetic seal for PBO in body armor. The sealed tubes were held at a constant temperature of 55°C and periodically sampled. Over a period of seven months there was no significant change in the tensile strength of these yarns, as indicated by the flat line for the "Sealed Tube" study in Figure 10.

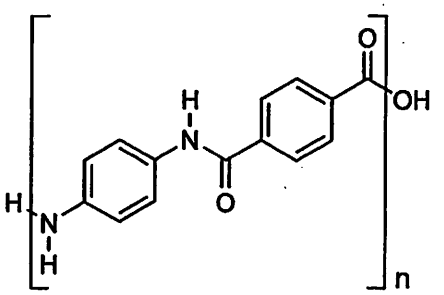
The sealed tube study confirms that PBO does not degrade under hot and dry conditions. The results indicate that if PBO is isolated from external sources of moisture, there is no significant change in its properties. This is a key finding because examinations of many used armor samples have revealed that most designs do little to protect the PBO from all forms of moisture. Traditionally, many armor models have used armor panel materials considered to be "waterproof," and their purpose was to lessen the amount of liquid water that could pass through the covering and into the ballistic materials. The Phase I and Phase II tests have revealed that many armor designs do not address the potential for water vapor transmission through the armor panel covering. Some armor models actually incorporate breathable membranes or fabrics that encourage the passage of humidity through the armor panel. Chemically, hydrolytic degradation would occur in the presence of either liquid water or water vapor.

DOJ_NMG_0143860



F. Correlation of Chemical Changes to Mechanical Properties

Examination and comparison of the spectra from the various yarns in Figure 9 indicate that the degree of hydrolysis is greatest in the officer's armor, followed by the archive armor, and the least in the new armor, relative to the virgin yarn. This rank order follows the same rank order of tensile strength loss reported in Table 6. Tensile strength loss is therefore correlated with the degree of hydrolysis.

G. Degradation Mechanisms

Current data suggests that hydrolytic degradation in PBO may occur in two steps, with the first step resulting in the opening of the oxazole ring to form a new chemical structure that is similar to, but not the same as Kevlar (Figure 11). Kevlar is known to have tensile properties that are less than PBO, so it is reasonable to expect that this degradation product has mechanical properties that are less than PBO. This particular structure still forms a continuous, but weakened, polymer chain. The scientific literature also indicates that this degradation product could be further degraded in a second step by a complete breakage in the polymer chain. Establishing the extent of these two degradation steps will provide insight into the lower bound of the strength of PBO fiber under normal use conditions.

In the present study, the FTIR technique clearly reveals breakage of the oxazole ring and the formation of other chemical bonds that correspond to degradation products that appear in the chemical degradation pathway described in detail elsewhere[24]. In theoretical models of fiber tensile strength and modulus developed by Termonia et al.[25] and Jones and Martin,[26] both groups state that decreases in polymer chain length (i.e., breaking of the molecular bonds) are more detrimental to tensile strength than to elastic modulus. These observations are consistent with the armor yarn tensile properties reported in this study, in which degradation was observed in tensile strength but not elastic modulus. Preliminary investigations into PBO degradation mechanisms have suggested that oxazole ring breakage occurs as a result of both moisture and light exposures. Additional work is underway using model compounds to confirm these degradation theories and to study the sensitivity of PBO to other environments.

The presence of residual acid, left over from the original processing of the PBO fiber, has been alleged to cause degradation. Additional studies are underway to investigate the presence of residual acid and its role in degradation. Results of those studies will be presented in a future report.

VI. Compliance Testing Process Review and Modifications

In his directive, the Attorney General charged NIJ with reviewing the existing process for compliance testing of body armor based on its research findings.

To respond to this directive, the U.S. Department of Justice convened a summit on March 11, 2004, to provide a forum for law enforcement, the scientific community, manufacturers, and other interested parties to discuss concerns with the reliability of body armor. Summit participants also examined the results of the ongoing testing of body armor systems containing Zylon®, the future of body armor technology and the current NIJ compliance testing process. Summit participants strongly recommended that NIJ revise its current compliance testing program to address the continued performance of body armor during its warranty period.

The current NIJ body armor standard is designed to assess the ballistic resistance of new armor systems. The standard does not include tests that address the ongoing performance of armor systems. The current process has adequately assessed the ballistic capabilities of new body armor systems—as demonstrated by the successful use of body armor over the past 30 years. However, the adequate performance of new armor is not, in and of itself, sufficient to ensure that the body armor actually being worn by officers will sufficiently protect them from death or serious injury. NIJ's research findings on Zylon® indicate that ongoing performance must be considered with body armor systems that contain materials whose physical properties degrade substantially as a result of environmental exposures.

Unfortunately, there are limited data concerning the ongoing performance of ballistic-resistant materials and associated armor systems currently in widespread use in the United States. Also, there is no accepted test protocol to evaluate the performance of used body armor over a period of years of typical law enforcement use. Future testing and research will support the development of a comprehensive and scientifically-rigorous compliance testing process designed to assure officers that their armor will continue to protect them over the armor's full warranty period.

In the meantime, NIJ will implement interim changes to its body armor compliance testing process. These interim changes create new requirements for all body armor manufacturers. However, manufacturers of Zylon®-based armor must satisfy additional requirements. They must affirmatively demonstrate to NIJ that their body armor will maintain its ballistic performance during the declared warranty period. Without such evidence, these body armors will not comply with the requirements of NIJ's body armor compliance testing program.

NIJ is continuing its comprehensive research to examine ballistic-resistant materials and improve our understanding of degradation mechanisms. As new information becomes available, NIJ will issue advisory notices to alert the public if any body armor materials appear to create a risk of death or serious injury as a result of degraded ballistic performance. Any body armor model that contains any material listed in such an advisory notice will be deemed no longer NIJ-compliant unless and until the manufacturer satisfies NIJ that the model will maintain its ballistic performance over its declared warranty period.

NIJ recommends that public safety agencies and officers purchase only bullet-resistant body armor models that comply with NIJ's new interim requirements, especially if their existing armor contains Zylon®. A list of models that comply with the requirements will be made available at http://www.justnet.org.

NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor

The detailed provisions of the interim changes to the NIJ voluntary body armor compliance testing program will be as follows.

Purpose and Scope

These requirements modify and supplement National Institute of Justice (NIJ) Standard 0101.04 (Ballistic Resistance of Personal Body Armor). They are promulgated on an interim basis to address recent NIJ research findings that indicate that certain body armor models previously found by NIJ to be compliant with earlier NIJ requirements for ballistic resistance of new body armor (including NIJ Standard 0101.04) may not adequately maintain ballistic performance during their service life. In keeping with their interim character, these requirements rely in significant part on specific certifications from manufacturers of body armor. To help ensure the accuracy of the certifications, NIJ intends to implement a plan to conduct random or other assessments of the certifications and the evidence that underlies them. Also, in furtherance of these efforts, from time to time, NIJ may issue Body Armor Standard Advisory Notices, among other things to identify to the public body armor materials that, based on NIJ review, appear to create a risk of death or serious injury as a result of degraded ballistic performance. Such Advisory Notices will be made available at: https://vests.ojp.gov/index.jsp.

NIJ recommends that those who purchase new bullet-resistant body armor after the effective date hereof select body armor models that comply with these interim requirements. A list of models that comply with these requirements will be made available at: http://www.justnet.org. NIJ will no longer publish lists of models found by NIJ (prior to the effective date hereof) to be compliant with earlier NIJ requirements for ballistic resistance of new body armor (including NIJ Standard 0101.04).

NIJ's efforts to ensure the safety of public safety officers are ongoing; NIJ intends to promulgate future modifications to these interim requirements as appropriate in light of its continued research and comments from the law enforcement and manufacturing communities. Comments and suggestions should be directed to the Director, Office of Science and Technology, National Institute of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, U.S. Department of Justice, 810 Seventh Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20531.

Requirements

Any body armor model submitted by a manufacturer to the NIJ Voluntary Compliance Testing Program on or after the effective date hereof or otherwise not subject to the Transition Provision (below) shall be subject to the following requirements:

1. Satisfaction, as determined by NIJ, of all of the requirements of NIJ Standard 0101.04 (including Addendum B), except as such requirements may be modified hereby;

2. Either –

   (a) Submission of evidence (e.g., design drawings and specifications, lists of materials of construction of each component of the model, research, ballistic testing, descriptions of performance characteristics of critical components or materials, etc.) that demonstrates to the satisfaction of NIJ that the model will maintain ballistic performance (consistent with its originally declared threat level) over its declared warranty period; or

   (b) Submission, by an officer of the manufacturer who has the authority to bind it, of a written certification, the sufficiency of which shall be determined by NIJ, that –

      (1) The model contains no material listed in an NIJ Body Armor Standard Advisory Notice in effect at the time of submission;

DOJ_NMG_0143864

(2) Lists the materials of construction of each component of the model;

(3) The officer, on behalf of the manufacturer –

(A) Reasonably believes that the model will maintain ballistic performance (consistent with its originally declared threat level) over its declared warranty period;

(B) Has objective evidence to support that belief; and

(C) Agrees to provide NIJ, promptly on demand, that evidence;

3. Submission, by an officer of the manufacturer who has the authority to bind it, of a written certification, the sufficiency of which shall be determined by NIJ, that labeling of armor shall be in accordance with NIJ Standard 0101.04, except that any references to such standard thereon shall instead be to the "NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements"; and

4. Submission, by an officer of the manufacturer who has the authority to bind it, of a written acknowledgment, the sufficiency of which shall be determined by NIJ, that –

(a) Recent NIJ research findings indicate that certain body armor models that were found by NIJ to be compliant with earlier NIJ requirements for ballistic resistance of new body armor (including NIJ Standard 0101.04) may not adequately maintain ballistic performance during their service life;

(b) NIJ recommends that those who purchase new bullet-resistant body armor select body armor models that comply with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements;

(c) NIJ will no longer publish lists of models found by NIJ to be compliant with earlier NIJ requirements for ballistic resistance of new body armor (including NIJ Standard 0101.04); and

(d) Any list or database of compliant body armor models published or sponsored by NIJ will include only models that are found by NIJ to comply with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements.

DOJ_NMG_0143865

NIJ will issue to the manufacturer an NIJ Notice of Compliance upon determination that these Requirements have been satisfied.

Transition Provision

Any body armor model that was submitted by a manufacturer to NIJ and was found by NIJ to be compliant with NIJ Standard 0101.04 prior to the effective date hereof shall, if made by the same manufacturer, be deemed to comply with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements upon issuance to the manufacturer of an NIJ Notice of Compliance. To obtain an NIJ Notice of Compliance, the manufacturer shall submit, with respect to the body armor model –

1. Either –

   (a) The evidence described in Requirements ¶ 2(a); or

   (b) The certification described in Requirements ¶ 2(b)(1) & (2);

2. With respect to armor manufactured more than ten days after the date of the NIJ Notice of Compliance, the certification described in Requirements ¶ 3; and

3. The acknowledgment described in Requirements ¶ 4.

In the event the manufacturer submits a certification pursuant to this Transition Provision ¶ 1(b), the manufacturer also must submit to NIJ, within 90 days of the date of the NIJ Notice of Compliance, the certification described in Requirements ¶ 2(b)(3); if the manufacturer fails to submit this certification, the body armor model shall be deemed no longer to be in compliance with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements (and shall be removed from any NIJ list of models that comply with the Requirements) until the manufacturer submits it and NIJ issues a new NIJ Notice of Compliance.

Loss of Compliance Status

A body armor model that is the subject of an NIJ Notice of Compliance shall be deemed no longer to be in compliance with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements (and shall be removed from any NIJ list of models that comply with the Requirements) if –

1. NIJ issues an NIJ Body Armor Standard Advisory Notice that identifies a material contained in the model;

2. NIJ determines that any certification or acknowledgment submitted with respect to the model is insufficient or inaccurate;

3. The manufacturer fails to provide NIJ promptly on demand the evidence described in Requirements ¶ 2(b)(3); or

DOJ_NMG_0143866

4. NIJ determines, at any time, that the evidence provided to NIJ as described in Requirements ¶ 2(b)(3) and/or in connection with the model is insufficient to demonstrate to the satisfaction of NIJ that the model will maintain its ballistic performance (consistent with its originally declared threat level) over its declared warranty period.

Once a body armor model loses compliance status under this provision, the model will remain out of compliance unless and until NIJ issues a new NIJ Notice of Compliance, following the submission of such evidence (e.g., evidence described in Requirements ¶ 2(a)), documentation, information, or other material as NIJ may require.

Labeling after Loss of Compliance Status
Armor manufactured during a period in which the armor model does not comply (or is deemed not to comply) with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements shall not be labeled as compliant with them.

VII. Summary

Body armor manufacturers must consider a number of competing requirements when they design an armor system that will maintain the intended level of ballistic resistance over time. Armor designers face demands to satisfy performance and operational requirements, while making the armor more comfortable by making it thinner, lighter, and cooler. It is critical for the armor design to anticipate potential changes that may occur in the armor during field use, because of the potential for those changes to affect adversely the ballistic performance of the armor. Users of body armor also have a responsibility to properly care for and maintain their body armor to reduce the potential for inadvertent damage to the armor.

There are hundreds of possible combinations of materials, weave patterns, stitching details, layer counts, and ply lay-ups that could be used to produce a body armor design that initially meets the requirements of the NIJ standard. Manufacturers are responsible for building an extra performance margin into their design. Because there are market incentives for building armor models that are thinner, lighter, and more breathable, the safety margins in armors may vary. The Zylon® fiber is susceptible to hydrolytic (moisture) and photolytic (light) degradation. Published scientific literature confirms these degradation mechanisms. Any armor design relying on Zylon® must take into account these susceptibilities and the resulting reduction in mechanical properties and ballistic performance. Based on test results of used armor, if Zylon® material is being relied upon to contribute ballistic resistance to body armor, then the body armor may not maintain the intended level of ballistic resistance.

The findings from ballistic testing and applied research have led to a better understanding of armor degradation mechanisms in Zylon® and other ballistic resistant materials, as well as the correlation between certain material properties and ballistic performance. These findings will also assist in the development of modifications to the existing body armor standard and compliance testing process, especially as it relates to test methods to ensure the ongoing performance of used body armor.

In the meantime, NIJ will issue the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor discussed in Section VI of this report. NIJ strongly recommends that those public safety agencies who purchase new bullet-resistant body armor select models that comply with these interim requirements. A list of compliant body armor models can be found at http://www.justnet.org.

NIJ continues to strongly encourage public safety officers to wear their Zylon®-containing body armor until it can be replaced.

Notes:
1) The ballistic limit tests were performed on the rear panels of each armor.
2) The tensile tests were performed on yarns extracted from the front panel of each armor.
3) The ballistic limit "Percent Decline" is calculated as the decline in the V50 value divided by the difference between the compliance V50 and the maximum NIJ reference velocity. Thus, a 100% V50 decline will correspond to a used armor V50 that has declined to the maximum NIJ reference velocity.

7) The armor condition refers to a visual inspection. Condition 1 refers to armor that shows no visible signs of wear and is in new or "like new" condition. Condition 2 refers to armor that shows light to moderate signs of wear. Condition 3 refers to armor that shows significant signs of wear (daily use for extended period). Condition 4 refers to armor that shows signs of extreme wear or abuse.

Appendix D. Individual Armor Models Tested

SCBA Tri-flex® Models

Production of this line of NIJ 0101.03-compliant armors was discontinued by SCBA in the spring of 2004. Fourteen of these armors were tested, including two that were more than five years old.

SCBA Tri-Flex® Models

Protection Level	Model Number	Number Tested
IIA	AZG-IIA 896280	1
II	AZG-II 995120	10
IIIA	AZG-IIIA 896280	3
	Total	14

- Twelve of the 14 Tri-flex® armors were penetrated by at least one round.
- Of those 12, 7 panels (50% of total panels tested) experienced penetrations from all six rounds and eleven of the 14 panels experienced four or more penetrations.
- One third of the 9mm rounds that did not penetrate the armor resulted in an excessive BFS and all armors experienced excessive BFS from the magnum rounds.
- The level IIA armor and the level II armors tested experienced at least two penetrations.

SCBA Ultima® Models

SCBA voluntarily stopped production of these models in the fall of 2003, and issued "Performance Pacs," upgrade kits that were intended to assure an armors performance as originally warranted. NIJ-sponsored tests in the fall of 2004 showed that the upgrade kits were insufficient, and SCBA has recently warned that all of these armors should be removed from service. Fifteen of the original ballistic armor panels were tested, including 10 that were greater than 60 months old.

- All nine armors tested experienced a penetration by at least one round.
- All of the BFS resulting from the other threat round exceeded 44 mm.

ABA Xtreme ZX Model

American Body Armor (ABA) reduced the warranty period of its level II ZX model XTZX2-1 (0101.04 compliant) from 60 months to 30 months in August 2004, in response to evidence that this and other ZX models were showing significant degradation in their ballistic performance. This hybrid armor model is constructed from laminated Zylon®, woven Zylon®, and ultra high molecular weight polyethylene.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL

FROM: Regina B. Schofield
Assistant Attorney General
Office of Justice Programs

SUBJECT: Bullet-resistant Vests

PURPOSE: To provide the Attorney General with information surrounding recent developments in the safety of bullet-resistant vests made from the Zylon® fiber, including the pending release of the Third Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities, published by the Office of Justice Programs' National Institute of Justice, and to seek approval for certain changes to the Bulletproof Vest Partnership program operated by the Office of Justice Programs' Bureau of Justice Assistance and to the requirements of the voluntary body armor compliance testing program of the National Institute of Justice.

TIMETABLE: As soon as possible.

BACKGROUND: In November 2003, Attorney General Ashcroft directed the Office of Justice Programs (OJP) to implement a number of priority projects in response to the failure of a body armor vest worn by a police officer in Pennsylvania. Collectively, these projects are known as the Attorney General's Body Armor Safety Initiative and include the examination of new and used Zylon®-based bullet-resistant vests and the review of the National Institute of Justice's (NIJ) existing compliance testing program. NIJ has issued two status reports to the Attorney General containing results from its body armor studies; they are available at https://vests.ojp.gov. The Initiative is ongoing, and NIJ has now completed its third status report.

The vest worn by the officer in Pennsylvania was manufactured by Second Chance Body Armor, Inc., and contained ballistic-resistant fiber known as Zylon®. Various state Attorneys General have filed suits against Second Chance and Toyobo Co., Ltd. (the manufacturer of Zylon® fiber). On June 22, 2005, Second Chance issued a public statement alleging that penetrations of Zylon® body armor are due to residual acid in

Zylon® fibers (essentially attempting to cast liability for the vest failure on the fiber manufacturer). Toyobo has denied these Second Chance allegations.

On June 30, 2005, the Department of Justice filed suit against both Second Chance and Toyobo, alleging, among other things, that the two companies suppressed evidence that the Zylon® fiber degraded substantially faster than expected when exposed to light, heat, and humidity, and sold Zylon®-containing vests to the U.S. government, knowing them to be defective. United States v. Second Chance, et al., CV-No. 04-280 (D.D.C.).

NIJ has now completed ballistic and mechanical properties testing on 103 used Zylon®-containing body armor vests provided by law enforcement agencies across the United States. Sixty of these used vests (58%) were penetrated by at least one round during a six-shot test series. Of the vests that were not penetrated, 91% had backface deformations in excess of that allowed by the NIJ standard for new armor, which deformations could lead to an increased risk of behind-armor injury. Only four of the used Zylon®-containing vests met all performance criteria expected under the NIJ standard for new body armor compliance.

Although these results do not conclusively prove that all Zylon®-containing body armor models have performance problems, the results clearly show that used Zylon®-containing body armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic resistance. In addition, the results imply that a visual inspection of a vest and its ballistic panels does not indicate whether a particular piece of Zylon®-containing body armor has maintained its ballistic performance. NIJ is now prepared to announce these results through the Third Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities.

We estimate that 200,000 state and local law enforcement officers have vests that contain Zylon® fibers. Statements by Second Chance and Toyobo, and the various lawsuits against one or both of them, raise (or have failed to remove) significant concerns in the law enforcement community about the safety of these officers. The release of NIJ's third status report is likely to compound these concerns.

The Bureau of Justice Assistance (BJA) is receiving inquiries as to whether its Bulletproof Vest Partnership program (BVP) will pay for the costs of vests to replace those that contain Zylon®. The BVP program is designed to provide a critical resource to state and local law enforcement that otherwise would not be available. The BVP program funds up to 50% of the costs of each vest purchased or replaced by law enforcement applicants. Eligible law enforcement officers include police officers, sheriff deputies, correctional officers, parole and probation agents, prosecutors, and judicial officials. Only body armor models that comply with NIJ requirements may be purchased with BVP program funds. The BVP program regulations, at 28 C.F.R. § 33.101, provide in pertinent part that BJA "will assist your jurisdiction in determining which type of armor vest will best suit your jurisdiction's needs, and will ensure that each armor vest obtained through the program meets the NIJ standard."

DOJ_NMG_0143880

RECOMMENDATIONS:

1. We recommend that NIJ adopt interim changes to its body armor compliance testing program to aid in ensuring that officers are protected by body armor that maintains its ballistic performance during its entire warranty period. Pursuant to those changes, models containing Zylon® will not be compliant, unless a manufacturer can provide satisfactory evidence to NIJ that the models will maintain their ballistic performance over their declared warranty period.

2. We recommend that, pending the adoption of interim changes to NIJ's body armor compliance testing program, BJA provide, pursuant to 28 C.F.R. § 33.101, that jurisdictions that participate in the BVP program are ineligible to receive payment for new orders placed for bullet-resistant body armor that contains Zylon®.

Executive Summary

On November 17, 2003, Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the U.S. Department of Justice's Body Armor Safety Initiative in response to concerns from the law enforcement community regarding the effectiveness of body armor in use. These concerns followed the failure of a relatively new Zylon®-based[1] body armor vest worn by a Forest Hills, Pennsylvania, police officer. The Attorney General directed the National Institute of Justice (NIJ) to initiate an examination of Zylon®-based bullet-resistant armor (both new and used), to analyze upgrade kits provided by manufacturers to retrofit Zylon®-based bullet-resistant armors, and to review the existing program by which bullet-resistant armor is tested to determine if the process needs modification.

As part of the Body Armor Safety Initiative, NIJ has issued two status reports to the Attorney General containing results from the body armor studies.[2] The first two status reports highlighted the following findings:

- Ballistic-resistant material, including Zylon®, can degrade due to environmental factors, thus reducing the ballistic resistance safety margin that manufacturers build into their armor designs.
- The ultimate tensile strength[3] of single yarns removed from the rear panel of the Forest Hills armor was up to 30-percent lower than that of yarns from "new" armor supplied by the manufacturer. Artificially-aged armor of the same type that failed in the Forest Hills incident was ballistically tested, but no bullet penetrations occurred.[4]
- The upgrade kits tested did not appear to bring used armor up to the level of performance of new armor. However, used armors with upgrade kits performed better than the used armors alone.

NIJ has now completed ballistic and mechanical properties testing on 103 used Zylon®-containing body armors provided by law enforcement agencies across the United States. Sixty of these used armors (58%) were penetrated by at least one round during a six-shot test series. Of the armors that were not penetrated, 91% had backface deformations in excess of that allowed by the NIJ standard for new armor, which deformations could lead to an increased risk of behind-armor injury. Only four of the used Zylon®-containing

2 "Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities," March 11, 2004, and "Supplement I: Status Report to the Attorney General on Body Armor Safety Initiative Testing and Activities," December 27, 2004.

3 Ultimate tensile strength is the maximum stress (force per unit area) that a material, in this case a Zylon® yarn, can withstand prior to failure. All Zylon® yarns were nominally 500 denier; i.e., the yarns did not vary in linear density or effective cross-sectional area.

4 NIJ continues to study the Forest Hills body armor penetration, to resolve the cause of that failure.

armors met all performance criteria expected under the NIJ standard for new body armor compliance.

Although these results do not conclusively prove that all Zylon®-containing body armor models have performance problems, the results clearly show that used Zylon®-containing body armor may not provide the intended level of ballistic resistance. In addition, the results imply that a visual inspection of body armor and its ballistic panels does not indicate whether a particular piece of Zylon®-containing body armor has maintained its ballistic performance.

Part of the Body Armor Safety Initiative entailed an applied research component that examined material properties of Zylon® in order to understand the causes of the ballistic failures. Zylon® fibers show a systematic loss in tensile strength, tensile strain, and ballistic performance correlated with the breakage of specific bonds in the chemical structure of the material.

Preliminary findings from the applied research effort indicate that:

- It is likely that the ballistic performance degradation in Zylon®-containing armors is closely related to the chemical changes in poly-p-phenylene benzobisoxazole (PBO), the chemical basis of Zylon® fiber. The breakage of one particular part of the PBO molecule, known as the oxazole ring, correlates with degradation of the mechanical properties of Zylon® fibers. The breakage in the oxazole ring can be monitored using an analysis technique known as Fourier transform infrared (FTIR) spectroscopy.
- Preliminary investigations into Zylon® degradation mechanisms have suggested that oxazole-ring breakage occurs as a result of exposure to both moisture and light.
- When there was no potential for external moisture to contact Zylon® yarns, there was no significant change in the tensile strength of these yarns. External moisture may be necessary to facilitate the degradation of Zylon® fibers.

Based on the direction from the Attorney General and recommendations from the law enforcement community, NIJ has examined its body armor compliance testing program. The current NIJ testing program is based on the ballistic resistance of new armor and does not take into account performance degradation in used armor. NIJ is concerned that Zylon® and other materials may be incorporated into body armor, with minimal understanding of performance degradation that may result from environmental exposures. NIJ's research indicates that its testing program should take into account the possibility of ballistic performance degradation over time.

NIJ intends to adopt interim changes to its body armor compliance testing program, to aid in ensuring that officers are protected by body armor that maintains its ballistic performance during its entire warranty period. These actions are set forth in detail in the Summary of this report. Under the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor, armor models containing PBO (the chemical basis of Zylon®) will not be compliant, unless a manufacturer can provide satisfactory evidence to NIJ that the models will maintain their ballistic performance over their declared warranty period.

In addition, NIJ will limit the use of PBO or any previously untested materials. A manufacturer will be able to submit any armor model to NIJ for testing for compliance with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements. But armor models containing PBO or new materials will be subject to certain additional requirements. Specifically, to participate in the NIJ compliance testing program, manufacturers of such armors will have to provide information that demonstrates that the model submitted for testing will maintain ballistic performance over its full warranty period. Manufacturers will be required to submit information concerning materials used in the construction of any armor submitted for testing.

NIJ will recommend that those who purchase new bullet-resistant body armor select body armor models that comply with the NIJ 2005 Interim Requirements for Bullet-Resistant Body Armor. A list of models that comply with the requirements will be made available at http://www.justnet.org.

NIJ will also encourage manufacturers to adopt a quality-management system to ensure the consistent construction and performance of NIJ-compliant armor over its warranty period. In the future, NIJ will issue advisories to the field regarding materials used in the construction of body armor that appear to create a risk of death or serious injury. Any body armor model that contains any material listed in such an advisory will be deemed no longer NIJ-compliant until the manufacturer submits satisfactory evidence that the model will maintain ballistic performance over its declared warranty period. NIJ will continue its research and evaluation program to determine what additional modifications to the requirements of NIJ's compliance testing program may be appropriate, to understand better the degradation mechanisms affecting existing or new ballistic materials, and to develop test methods for the ongoing performance of body armor.

NIJ continues to encourage public safety officers to wear their Zylon® - containing armor until it can be replaced. Even armor that may have degraded ballistic performance is better than no armor.

4) The magnum threats for level II armor are a 158 gr. 357 Magnum JSP bullet with a velocity of 1395 (+50/-0) ft/s for NIJ 0101.03 armor and a velocity of 1430 (±30) ft/s for NIJ 0101.04 armor.
5) The 9 mm threats for level IIIA armor are a 124 gr. 9 mm FMJ RN bullet with a velocity of 1400 (+50/-0) ft/s for NIJ 0101.03 armor and a velocity of 1430 (±30) ft/s for NIJ 0101.04 armor.
6) The magnum threats for level IIIA armor are a 240 gr. 44 Mag LSWCGC bullet at 1400 (+50/-0) ft/s for NIJ 0101.03 armor and a 240 gr. 44 Mag SJHP bullet at 1430 (±30) ft/s for NIJ 0101.04 armor.
7) The armor condition refers to a visual inspection. Condition 1 refers to armor that shows no visible signs of wear and is in new or "like new" condition. Condition 2 refers to armor that shows light to moderate signs of wear. Condition 3 refers to armor that shows significant signs of wear (daily use for extended period). Condition 4 refers to armor that shows signs of extreme wear or abuse.

Notes:
1) The ballistic limit tests were performed on the rear panels of each armor.
2) The tensile tests were performed on yarns extracted from the front panel of each armor.
3) The ballistic limit "Percent Decline" is calculated as the decline in the V50 value divided by the difference between the compliance V50 and the maximum NIJ reference velocity. Thus, a 100% V50 decline will correspond to a used armor V50 that has declined to the maximum NIJ reference velocity.

HIGHLIGHTS FROM THE WHITE HOUSE'S "NATIONAL STRATEGY FOR VICTORY IN IRAQ"

Political:

- Counter false propaganda and demonstrate to all Iraqis that they have a stake in a democratic nation.
- Invite groups willing to stop violent actions into the political process through expanding avenues of participation.
- Build stable national institutions and help integrate Iraq into the international community.

Security:

- Clear areas of enemy control by killing and capturing enemy fighters and denying them a haven.
- Hold areas freed of enemy influence and ensure they remain under control of the Iraqi government.
- Build Iraqi security forces and the capacity of local institutions to advance the rule of law.

Economic:

- Restore Iraq's infrastructure to meet the demands of a growing economy.
- Reform Iraq's economy so it can be self-sustaining in the future.
- Build the capacity of Iraqi institutions to maintain the infrastructure.

Troops:

- U.S. troop deployment probably will change over the next year, though this cannot be guaranteed.
- The U.S. military presence will be less visible but will remain lethal and decisive.
- Troops will return home when the mission to win the war is complete.

McCain

How can the Administration seriously oppose a law banning CID in interrogations?

Doesn't this make us look terrible with our allies that you claim in your speech are so vital to the War on Terror?

Doesn't this make us look terrible with the Muslim community across the world, whose hearts and minds we must win in order to succeed in the War on Terror, as you pointed out in your speech?

Is the VP driving this issue? Do you disagree with him? How about others in the Administration?

Do you consider our Geneva obligations to avoid CID to apply to foreign nationals held abroad? Didn't you say at your confirmation hearing that you thought our obligations to avoid CID don't apply to aliens abroad?

Graham

Why deny detainees access to the courts if you're so confident our procedures are sound and defensible?

> Wouldn't it enhance our credibility and prestige in the world to allow judicial review?

Doesn't holding detainees without charges indefinitely hurt our moral standing in the world? With our allies? With the Muslim community? Isn't this inconsistent with our effort to win hearts and minds?

How can we square our policy of holding detainees indefinitely when the UK is debating the propriety of holding suspects for just a few days or weeks before presenting criminal charges?

How can you defend the DoD procedures you outline when they don't even provide access to counsel, or any right to see classified evidence used against the individual?

How can you defend continuing to hold NLECs for years even after they've been found NOT to be enemy combatants? (Uighurs)

Do you agree or disagree w/ the Bybee Memo that the torture statute only covers physical injuries that result in death or organ failure? Or psychological pain that results in the infliction of lasting harms like post traumatic stress disorder?

Do you agree with the Yoo Memo to Haynes that grave breaches under Geneva include only death or severe physical injury?

Do you agree with the SEC DEF that there's nothing wrong with requiring detainees to stand for 18 hours in stress positions?

What do you think about water boarding? Have you approved it?

Shouldn't we apply Geneva protections and the Army Field Manual to our enemies in order to ensure protection of our own troops? In order to ensure our moral standing in the world?

Patriot Act

Why should we allow personal records from libraries, bookstores, doctor's offices, business, and other entities that are not connected to an international terrorist or spy to be obtained using either a secret order under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) or a "national security letter" (NSL) issued by an FBI official without any court oversight?

Why should we allow secret FISA orders and NSLs to bar a recipient from telling anyone (other than the recipient's lawyer) that records have been obtained? Isn't that a violation of the 1A?

How can we say that "sneak and peek" search warrants are appropriate even cases having nothing to do with terrorism?

COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS
General Department of Justice Q&As December 1, 2005

I. NEW AND UPDATED Q&As

Nomination of Samuel Alito:

Q: In a 1985 memo, Judge Alito recommended that the federal government participate in Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists in support of unconstitutional restrictions on a woman's right to choose. Doesn't this indicate that he would reverse Roe v. Wade if given the opportunity?

A: The best indication of Judge Alito's judicial philosophy is his fifteen years of well-regarded service as a judge on the court of appeals, which shows careful reasoning, measured decision-making, and respect for precedent. The Thornburgh memo clearly reflects the Reagan Administration's policy of opposing Roe v. Wade. That year, a White House press release made clear that President Reagan "believes that abortion should be prohibited except when the life of the mother is endangered." Judge Alito wrote as a government lawyer tasked with advancing the Administration's policy goals through participation in cases before the federal courts. The memo sheds no light on his approach to these issues as a judge or justice.

Supreme Court Abortion Case:

Q: What was the Department's position yesterday in the abortion case argued before the Supreme Court?

A: In previous cases the Court has not required every statute to contain an express health exception. The New Hampshire statute contained a sufficient life-of-the-mother exemption and was not required to contain an express health exception.

The challengers to the law have not demonstrated that health emergencies would preclude operation of the law in more than a small fraction of cases where the law applies.

The Court's decision in Planned Parenthood v. Casey did not alter the standard for facial challenges outside of the context of spousal-notification provisions.

Background: The Department of Justice was an amicus in the case of Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood. Most of our argument concerned the standards for a facial challenge to the law. The New Hampshire statute prohibits a physician from performing an abortion on an unemancipated minor until 48 hours after a parent or guardian receives written notice. There is a judicial bypass provision—the minor is mature and can make an informed decision, or the bypass is in the girl's best interests.

Padilla—4th Circuit's Decision:

Q: What does the 4th Circuit's decision asking the government to submit briefs on Jose Padilla's detention status mean for the Justice Department's case? Isn't this a set back?

A: Obviously we will comply with the Court's order in this case.

If pushed: As I mentioned to the media last week when announcing the indictment of Mr. Padilla, our position is that Padilla's pending case questioning the government's authority to hold him as an enemy combatant is now moot and we are preparing our briefs to the 4th Circuit on that very issue.

Interrogation Techniques:

Q: Are interrogation techniques such as water boarding lawful from DOJ's perspective?

A: I am not going to address hypothetical scenarios or discuss specific techniques used by the intelligence community. What I can tell you is that the Administration policy is very clear. We do not support or condone using torture under any circumstances. There are no exceptions. In addition to the President's clear direction on this issue, we also have domestic laws and international treaties that prohibit us from engaging in any type of torture. When there is any hint or suggestion that someone acting on behalf of the United States has engaged in torture it is fully and promptly investigated. We have a zero tolerance policy for that kind of behavior.

Graham Legislation:

Q: Was the Department of Justice involved in the effort to strip habeas rights from detainees during the drafting of the Graham legislation?

A: The Department of Justice works with Congress on a number of issues on a regular basis, offering technical assistance to legislators. I'm not going to get into the specific conversations about the Administration's ongoing discussions with the Congress about various pieces of legislation on the Hill dealing with detainees.

Saddam Hussein Trial—Iraqi Special Tribunal:

Q: Why is there no international tribunal?

A: The U.N. Security Council never created an international ad hoc tribunal for Iraq, as it did for Yugoslavia and Rwanda. Following the liberation of Iraq, the Iraqi Governing Council chose to create a domestic court, with international support, so that trained Iraqi judges and prosecutors could conduct fair and impartial tribunals against high-level members of the regime as a part of the national reconciliation process, and as a symbol that rule of law has returned to Iraq.

Q: How is the system structured?

A: Iraq uses the civil law system, which they derived from the Egyptian and French legal systems. The civil-law system is an Inquisitorial (non-adversarial) system, under which the prosecutor and defense counsel have limited roles. Instead, the Judge is a truth-seeker who gathers exculpatory and inculpatory evidence, questions witnesses and makes legal rulings, including guilt or innocence. There is no jury. Accordingly, the IST trials will look different than trials in the United States. You can expect to see a panel of trial judges reviewing the Investigative File (prepared by the Investigative Judges), calling and questioning witnesses, and making determinations. While the defendant can invoke the right to remain silent, under civil law this may be taken as a sign of guilt.

Q: Does the IST have the death penalty?

A: Yes. In article 24, the IST statute states that the penalties imposed by the IST shall be those prescribed by Iraqi law. As Iraqi criminal law authorizes the death penalty, this article incorporates that sanction into the IST.

Q: Are there international advisors for the IST judges?

A: The original IST statute required international advisors for the IST. By August 2005, no countries, international organizations or NGOs had provided any international advisors to the IST judges, and the Transitional National Assembly made this requirement optional when they revised the statute. An international fund is being established to help pay the costs of international advisors.

II. RECENT NEWS

CIA Black Sites:

Q: There have been recent reports that key al Qaeda suspects are being held in Eastern Europe and other secret facilities that exist around the world. Do you feel these facilities are necessary?

A: I'm not going to talk about specific intelligence activities. What I can reassure the American people is that this Administration is doing what we need to do to protect America from another domestic attack here in this country and against attacks against our allies. We have a patient and diabolical enemy intent on harming Americans. All of the tools we use to fight the war on terror are consistent with our legal obligations both domestically and internationally.

Q: Can you tell me if the Administration is considering changing the policy that allows these facilities to exist?

A: Again, I'm not going to talk about specific intelligence activities, either confirming or denying the existence of these kinds of activities. What I want to do again is reassure the American people that this President has directed that we do everything that we can do and should be doing to protect America but to do so in a way consistent with our legal obligations both domestically and internationally.

McCain Legislation:

Q: Why won't the Administration support the McCain legislation, which prohibits torture and cruel and degrading treatment of those in U.S. custody? The U.S. says that we don't support torture but at the same time the Administration is unwilling to support a law that would make that policy clear to the rest of the world. Why is that?

A: Dialogue about these new and important issues that now face us in a post 9-11 world is constructive. I want to point out that we cannot lose sight of the fact that we face a very patient, diabolical enemy who intends to harm us again. The attacks in London and Madrid and the recent arrests in Australia all point to an enemy intent on harming freedom loving people everywhere. We have been using every tool at our disposal to prevent another attack in this country and we have done so in a way that is consistent with our legal obligations abroad and in compliance with our own domestic laws. Different members of the Administration have stated repeatedly that the U.S. does not condone torture and when there is abuse that does occur those individuals will be held accountable for their illegal actions. The Administration has been very clear about this. I know there are different pieces of legislation that are currently being circulated that address different issues surrounding detainee policy but I think it is important to focus on the existing policy which is very clear: we take our legal obligations very seriously and this government will not stand for torture under any circumstance.

Guantanamo Detainees:

Q: Members of Congress have called for some kind of independent commission to look into the question of detainees, interrogation centers, and Guantanamo. Is this something you would be willing to support?

A: These cases of alleged abuse in Guantanamo are not the norm and are not indicative of the behavior of our troops.

- To assess detention activities, the Administration has conducted more than 10 major reviews, assessments, and investigations, which produced over 500 specific recommendations to improve operations, many of which have already been implemented.

- In addition, there have been 24-hour inspections by the International Red Cross at Guantanamo.

We will continue to aggressively investigate credible allegations of prisoner abuse, to hold individuals accountable for wrongdoing, and to implement fixes to minimize the likelihood of future abuse.

Guantanamo—Geneva Convention:

Q: The Geneva Conventions apply to prisoners of war. Why won't the United States recognize the rights of the prisoners of war at Guantanamo?

A: Al Qaeda is a terrorist organization that has killed thousands of innocent people from many countries, and it is continually trying to find ways to keep killing innocent people. It is not a party to the Geneva Convention, and thus the Convention does not apply to al Qaeda.

The Convention creates requirements for POW status that al Qaeda and the Taliban don't meet: things such as fixed distinctive emblems or uniforms, a command organization, the carrying of arms openly, and other factors. The attacks of September 11th and the other terrorist acts al Qaeda has committed around the world targeted innocent civilians and are in flagrant defiance of the law of armed conflict.

President Bush has determined that while the Geneva Convention applies to Taliban detainees because Afghanistan is a signatory to the Convention, they're not POW's under the Convention because—like al Qaeda—they don't meet the Convention's own requirements for POW status.

Although it is difficult to speak to every type of hypothetical, generally speaking, prisoners captured in Iraq are covered by the Geneva Convention.

It is important to point out, however, that even in cases where the Convention does not apply, U.S. policy is to treat each and every detainee in our custody humanely.

Renditions:

Q: What is your official policy on the issue of renditions and their use?

A: At every step of the way, President Bush and this administration have made very clear that we abide by the laws of our land and the treaty obligations we have. We will not torture here in America, and we will not export torture. That is unacceptable to this President, and something that we will not tolerate. When we do extradite we seek assurances from those other countries that these individuals will be treated humanely and in many instances we follow up with these countries to ensure that is happening.

USA PATRIOT Act Reauthorization:

Q: Privacy issues continue to concern the American public with relation to the USA PATRIOT Act, specifically regarding the use of National Security Letters, which allow the FBI to obtain a broad range of documents and records from libraries, business, and other entities while imposing a "nondisclosure" order on the recipient of the letter. Doesn't this practice violate the recipient's privacy as well as his First Amendment right to free speech?

A: The FBI is not spying on ordinary Americans. To the contrary, National Security Letters (NSLs) are issued only when the information sought is relevant to an authorized investigation to protect against international terrorism or clandestine intelligence activities.

- NSLs were not created by the PATRIOT Act. National Security Letters are an important law enforcement tool used to fight terrorists and espionage that have been around for decades.

- NSLs are a minimally intrusive preliminary investigative tool used to primarily check out tips and initial leads. In the post 9-11 world, the FBI must check all tips and leads—to do otherwise would be deeply irresponsible and could endanger the American people.

- NSLs allow the FBI to request that companies or individuals provide to the FBI certain narrow sets of records relating to electronic communications such as telephone subscription agreements, call records, or internet sign-on records. The information acquired through NSLs is extremely valuable to terrorism and espionage investigations, allowing the FBI to track the electronic communications of terrorists and spies without actually acquiring the content of that information.

- There has been some confusion out there regarding an individual's right to contest a NSL request and consult with an attorney. As I told Congress in April, the Department of Justice supports language that would clarify this misconception by making this implicit right to consult with an attorney, explicitly expressed in the revised bill.

- NSLs are subject to judicial review. If a recipient of an NSL chooses to contest the request, the FBI cannot compel that individual to comply. Only a federal judge can require an individual to comply with a NSL request.

Civil Rights Division—Washington Post:

Q: A recent article in the Washington Post alleged that morale among career attorneys in the Civil Rights Division has plummeted, the division's productivity has suffered, and the pace of civil rights enforcement has slowed. How do you respond?

A: These accusations are empirically untrue. This Administration has continued the robust and vigorous enforcement of civil rights laws. Among our many accomplishments include:

- The Civil Rights Division has more than tripled the enforcement of our human trafficking cases.
- The Division filed more criminal civil rights cases last year than in any other year in the Division's history.
- In the past five years, the Division brought more cases to enforce section 203 of the Voting Rights Act than brought in the previous 25 years combined.
- This Administration has a 90 percent rate of success in the federal courts of appeals, as compared to just 60 percent during the previous administration. In other words, courts are four times less likely to reject our legal arguments than the ones filed in the previous administration.
- These accomplishments could not have been achieved without teamwork between career attorneys and political appointees. Everyday, members of the Civil Rights Division—both careers and politicals—work side by side as a unit to enforce the nation's civil rights laws. We will continue to work together to further build on these accomplishments.

Padilla—Enemy Combatant Questions:

Q: Is Mr. Padilla still an enemy combatant?

A: The President has authorized the transfer of Mr. Padilla from the control of the Department of Defense to the Department of Justice for the purpose of criminal proceedings. So, upon that transfer, Mr. Padilla will no longer be held as an enemy combatant and the Defense Department's authority to detain him under the President's June 9, 2002 order will cease.

Q: But is he still designated as an enemy combatant? Does this mean the designation was wrong?

A: His designation as enemy combatant in June 2002 is legally irrelevant to the charges returned by the Grand Jury in Florida, which were unsealed today. He will no longer be detained as an enemy combatant. He will be a defendant in the criminal justice system and stand in the same position as any other defendant in that system.

Q: What do you plan to do if Mr. Padilla is acquitted in the criminal case or given bail?

Are you going to return him to Department of Defense custody?

A: I am not going to comment on any hypothetical situations. We are fully confident in the strength of our case.

Padilla—Questions Regarding the Timing of Charges:

Q: Why are you charging Mr. Padilla now? Is the timing of this indictment designed to prevent Supreme Court review because you are afraid you may lose in that Court?

A: Prosecutors make decisions all the time as to when it is the appropriate time to charge defendants based upon a variety of factors, including careful consideration of national security interests. As I said in my statement, the President has made clear that we will utilize all of the tools available to us to protect Americans from acts of terrorists and these determinations are made on a case-by-case basis. We believe that, under the present circumstances, it is the appropriate time to charge this defendant in this case. I think it is important to note that Mr. Padilla is being added as a defendant to a pre-existing indictment that has been pending against his co-defendants, who are scheduled to go to trial in September 2006. We intend to ask the Court to set the same schedule for Mr. Padilla since he is now a defendant in that case.

On the issue of Supreme Court review, Mr. Padilla has filed a petition with the Court and we plan to oppose a grant of certiorari. In his habeas petition, the relief sought by Mr. Padilla was either to be released or charged in a criminal court. We intend to argue that, since he has been charged by a Grand Jury in criminal court, his petition is now moot and the Court should not grant review. The ultimate decision on this issue is obviously for the Court.

Padilla—Questions Regarding Post-November 2001 Conduct:

Q: Why haven't you charged Mr. Padilla with the "dirty bomb" plot or other conduct that was the basis for the enemy combatant designation?

A: In determining which charges to bring in terrorism cases, prosecutors must consider Many factors, including national security interests. Consistent with those interests and considerations, we have obtained an indictment against Mr. Padilla and his co-defendants that alleges a long-term conspiracy involving activities that span over an eight-year period—from October 1993 until November 2001. The charges returned by the Grand Jury are extremely serious and, if convicted, Mr. Padilla and his co-defendants face a maximum penalty of life imprisonment.

Q: Do you still stand by Mr. Comey's statements?

A: Mr. Comey's June 2004 statements regarding Mr. Padilla's designation as an enemy combatant are not relevant to the charges returned by the Grand Jury in Florida. We are here to announce those charges today. As with all our cases, I am not going to comment on anything beyond the four corners of the indictment.

Q: Isn't it unfair to Mr. Padilla that the Government has for years labeled him as the "dirty bomber" and now he's not even charged with that plot so that he can defend those charges? How can he possibly get a fair trial? Didn't that press conference, with talk about dirty bomb plots, taint any jury pool?

A: Again, I am not going to comment beyond the four corners of the indictment. Of course, as with any criminal defendant, he is presumed innocent unless and until proven guilty of the charges. I fully expect that Mr. Padilla can and will receive a fair trial in our criminal justice system. Our courts are fully capable of handling any issues regarding pretrial publicity, as well as publicity during the trial.

Doesn't holding detainees without charges indefinitely hurt our moral standing in the world? With our allies? With the Muslim community? Isn't this inconsistent with our effort to win hearts and minds?

How can we square our policy of holding detainees indefinitely when the UK is debating the propriety of holding suspects for just a few days or weeks before presenting criminal charges?

How can you defend the DoD procedures you outline when they don't even provide access to counsel, or any right to see classified evidence used against the individual?

How can you defend continuing to hold NLECs for years even after they've been found NOT to be enemy combatants? (Uighurs)

Are the reports true that you and others prevailed over the VP in agreeing to a deal with Sen. Graham?

Wouldn't the Graham legislation make the McCain prohibitions on CID nearly impossible to enforce in courts?

GTMO/AbuGharib/Torture Memos

Do you agree or disagree w/ the Bybee Memo that the torture statute only covers physical injuries that result in death or organ failure? Or psychological pain that results in the infliction of lasting harms like post traumatic stress disorder?

Do you agree with the Yoo Memo to Haynes that grave breaches under Geneva include only death or severe physical injury?

Do you agree with the SEC DEF that there's nothing wrong with requiring detainees to stand for 18 hours in stress positions?

What do you think about water boarding? Have you approved it?

Shouldn't we apply Geneva protections and the Army Field Manual to our enemies in order to ensure protection of our own troops? In order to ensure our moral standing in the world?

> Doesn't it undermine our efforts to convince the world that they should take human rights seriously when we interpret our obligations so narrowly?
>
> Isn't all human life worth the same protection?

Is there a link between the torture memos coming out and then the atrocities at GTMO and Abu Gharib?

> Did they create a "climate" or "tone at the top" in which you should've foreseen that torture would be applied?
>
> How many detainees have died in US custody during or as a result of interrogations? Are you willing to say "none"? Why not?

Have the aggressive interrogation techniques employed by the Admin yielded any valuable intelligence? Have they ever stopped a terrorist incident? Examples?

Don't the experts in this field agree that torture doesn't yield useful intelligence? If so, why are we pushing the envelope in this area?

Why won't the USG release all of the photos of misconduct at Abu Gharib?

What assurances do you obtain before sending a detainee back to his home country? Do we just allow home governments to "do our torture for us"?

Black Sites

Do we use them?

What legal protections exist to ensure against torture or CID there?

Doesn't the use of such places – without any examination by courts, the ICRC, or others - undermine our moral authority in the war on terror? Doesn't it jeopardize our standing with allies? With the Muslim community?

Patriot Act

Why should we allow personal records from libraries, bookstores, doctor's offices, business, and other entities that are not connected to an international terrorist or spy to be obtained using either a secret order under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) or a "national security letter" (NSL) issued by an FBI official without any court oversight?

Why should we allow secret FISA orders and NSLs to bar a recipient from telling anyone (other than the recipient's lawyer) that records have been obtained? Isn't that a violation of the 1A?

How can we say that "sneak and peek" search warrants are appropriate even cases having nothing to do with terrorism?

Why should we make so many changes permanent, when the Admin keeps telling us we are winning the war on terrorism?

How can we endorse a death penalty provision even where the defendant had no intent to kill or to act in reckless disregard of human life (Sect 214)? Or reduce the number of jurors from 12? How do you square that with the 8A?

Padilla

Why did you wait so long to indict him?

Why didn't you indict him on the dirty bomb plot?

Isn't this -- and your speech -- a recognition that the criminal justice is the right way to go in combating terrorism at home? And that such a tactic can be quite successful?

Were you afraid of the Supreme Court review and just trying to hide from court scrutiny?

Why is the Administration generally so distrustful of courts reviewing its conduct in the War on Terror?

Iraq

What's the time table for withdrawal?

Why hasn't the Admin put in more troops?

What is "victory" in Iraq?

In your speech, you say we work well with our allies in the War on Terror. But why didn't we do a better job of working with our allies in the most important front – Iraq?

Defend the Admin's view on WMDs.

What are the true capabilities of the Iraqui police? Is DOJ doing anything to assist them? Same for Iraqui judiciary.

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted, insert the following:

SEC. ___. REVIEW OF STATUS OF DETAINEES.

(a) Submittal of Procedures for Status Review of Detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.--Not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall submit to the congressional defense committees, and to the Committees on the Judiciary of the Senate and the House of Representatives, a report setting forth the procedures of the Combatant Status Review Tribunals and the noticed Administrative Review Boards in operation at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for determining the status of the detainees held at Guantanamo Bay.

(b) Procedures.--The procedures submitted to Congress pursuant to subsection (a) shall, with respect to proceedings beginning after the date of the submittal of such procedures under that subsection, ensure that--

(1) in making a determination of status of any detainee under such procedures, a Combatant Status Review Tribunal or Administrative Review Board may not consider statements derived from persons that, as determined by such Tribunal or Board, by the preponderance of the evidence, were obtained with undue coercion; and

(2) the Designated Civilian Official shall be an officer of the United States Government whose appointment to office was made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

(c) Report on Modification of Procedures.--The Secretary of Defense shall submit to the committees of Congress referred to in subsection (a) a report on any modification of the procedures submitted under subsection (a) not later than 60 days before the date on which such modification goes into effect.

(d) Judicial Review of Detention of Enemy Combatants.--

(1) IN GENERAL.--Section 2241 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

``(e) No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien outside the United States (as that term is defined in section 101(a)(38) of the Immigration and Naturalization Act (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(38)) who is detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.".

(2) REVIEW OF DECISIONS OF COMBATANT STATUS REVIEW TRIBUNALS OF PROPRIETY OF DETENTION.--

(A) IN GENERAL.--Subject to subparagraphs (B), (C), and (D), the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit shall have exclusive jurisdiction to determine the validity of any decision of a Designated Civilian Official described in subsection (b)(2) that an alien is properly detained as an enemy combatant.

(B) LIMITATION ON CLAIMS.--The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit under this paragraph shall be limited to claims brought by or on behalf of an alien--

(i) who is, at the time a request for review by such court is filed, detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and

(ii) for whom a Combatant Status Review Tribunal has been conducted, pursuant to applicable procedures specified by the Secretary of Defense.

(C) SCOPE OF REVIEW.--The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on any claims with respect to an alien under this paragraph shall be limited to the consideration of--

(i) whether the status determination of the Combatant Status Review Tribunal with regard to such alien applied the correct standards and was consistent with the procedures specified by the Secretary of Defense for Combatant Status Review Tribunals (including the requirement that the conclusion of the Tribunal be supported by a preponderance of the evidence and allowing a rebuttable presumption in favor the Government's evidence); and

(ii) whether subjecting an alien enemy combatant to such standards and procedures is consistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

(D) TERMINATION ON RELEASE FROM CUSTODY.--The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit with respect to the claims of an alien under this paragraph shall cease upon the release of such alien from the custody of the Department of Defense.

(3) REVIEW OF FINAL DECISIONS OF MILITARY COMMISSIONS.--

(A) IN GENERAL.--Subject to subparagraphs (C) and (D), the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit shall have exclusive jurisdiction to determine the validity of any final decision rendered pursuant to Military Commission Order No. 1, dated August 31, 2005 (or any successor military order).

(B) GRANT OF REVIEW.--Review under this paragraph--

(i) with respect to a capital case or a case in which the alien was sentenced to a term of imprisonment of 10 years or more, shall be as of right; or

(ii) with respect to any other case, shall be at the discretion of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

(C) LIMITATION ON APPEALS.--The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit under this paragraph shall be limited to an appeal brought by or on behalf of an alien--

(i) who was, at the time of the proceedings pursuant to the military order referred to in subparagraph (A), detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba; and

(ii) for whom a final decision has been rendered pursuant to such military order.

(D) SCOPE OF REVIEW.--The jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit on an appeal of

MEMORANDUM FOR THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL 7/28/06

FROM: Peter D. Keisler
Assistant Attorney General
Civil Division

SUBJECT: Availability and Proposed Uses of the Civil Division's Unobligated Balances

As requested in your May 1, 2006, memorandum, I am submitting estimates of the unobligated prior year balances that are available for transfer from Civil Division accounts to the Department's Working Capital Fund and to the Automated Litigation Support (ALS) no-year account.[1] The Civil Division can transfer $11,580,000 to these accounts. Attachment 1 summarizes the amounts for each year.

The Civil Division seeks to apply these balances to address major Division and Department needs: $8,640,000 for the Spent Nuclear Fuel litigation, and $2,700,000 to invest in the next generation of telecommunications for the litigating divisions.

The Spent Nuclear Fuel litigation needs $8,640,000 for automated litigation support services. To date, over 66 suits have been filed by nuclear power utilities that are seeking damages for the government's failure to begin acceptance of spent nuclear fuel. Nuclear utility industry publications have estimated that claims for the first ten years of delay will exceed $50 billion by 2008. The litigation is extremely active, with six cases scheduled for trial through FY 2007. While the Department has consistently supported funding increases for this litigation, Congress has not appropriated the requested funding. Attachment 2 provides background on this requirement.

[1] The Department's annual appropriation allows for up to $10,000,000 in unobligated balances to remain available to the litigating divisions for litigation support contracts. The Department uses this provision to transfer these balances into an account ("the ALS No-Year Account") established for this purpose. Balances transferred to this account are then distributed to meet urgent, but unfunded, litigation support requirements. The column of the chart in Attachment 1 labeled "Remaining 'Capacity' of the ALS No-Year Account to Accept Funds" shows $10 million minus the amount already deposited to this account each fiscal year.

The $2,700,000 we are requesting for telecommunications will fund replacement networks as the current Metropolitan Area Network is phased out. The replacement networks will incorporate redundancy, as well as firewalls and intrusion detection technology to ensure security. We do not know exactly how much funding will be required or when it will be needed. However, we do know that the Civil Division and other litigating divisions will be migrating soon. The FY 2007 budget pending before Congress does not include funding for this requirement. Consequently, either the components will have to absorb the costs by taking cuts elsewhere, or alternative funding sources will need to be developed. The transfer we are proposing would provide such an alternative for Civil and the other divisions.

I would be happy to meet with you to discuss this subject.

His Excellency

Minister of Justice of the People's Republic of China

Dear Mr. Minister:

I write to inform you of the court of appeals' decision in the case of Yang Rong v. Liaoning Province, No. 05-7030 (D.C. Cir.), a case about which we have previously corresponded. The court's decision is favorable to the Chinese Government.

You previously wrote to me to express the Chinese Government's position in the Yang Rong case and to ask the United States to consider filing a statement of interest in that case. I responded to your letter on May 15, 2006, explaining that, as a procedural matter, it would be inappropriate for the United States to file a statement of interest, because the parties had already filed briefs and presented oral argument and were awaiting the court of appeals' decision. I also explained that, after careful consideration of the matter, the Department of State advised us that it would be inappropriate for the United States to file a statement of interest at that time.

On July 7, 2006, the court of appeals issued an opinion affirming the district court's dismissal of Yang Rong's suit against Liaoning Province. The court decided that the Chinese Government is immune from suit in this case under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, a United States law providing foreign sovereigns immunity from suit in the United States unless the case falls under one of the limited exceptions stated in the law. Enclosed is a copy of the court of appeals' decision for your review.

Under the United States' legal system, it is possible for a plaintiff to seek further review of such a decision. However, the court of appeals' decision is a substantial victory for China's position.

I hope that this information is helpful to your understanding of this matter, and I look forward to future cooperation between China and the United States on issues of mutual concern.

Sincerely,

Alberto R. Gonzales
Attorney General

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL 8/2/06

FROM: Sue Ellen Wooldridge
Assistant Attorney General

SUBJECT: Acceptance of Concurrent Legislative Jurisdiction at Bureau of Prisons Facility in Devens, Massachusetts

PURPOSE: To obtain the signature of Attorney General Gonzales

TIMETABLE: Review and signature without delay

SYNOPSIS: The Attorney General should accept concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction, on behalf of the United States and from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts over the land comprising the Federal Medical Center Devens. Acceptance of concurrent legislative jurisdiction will allow the Federal Government to enforce certain federal laws that apply only within areas under the United States' legislative jurisdiction, without displacing state enforcement authorities.

DISCUSSION: The Bureau of Prisons (Bureau) desires to acquire concurrent criminal and civil legislative jurisdiction over the site of the Federal Medical Center at Devens (FMC Devens). The Commonwealth recently approved cession of concurrent jurisdiction to the United States over FMC Devens. Under federal law, this cession does not take effect until accepted by the Attorney General.

This memorandum recommends that the Attorney General accept concurrent legislative jurisdiction on behalf of the United States for the site.

RECOMMENDATION: I recommend that you sign the enclosed letter to Governor Romney of Massachusetts, accepting concurrent jurisdiction for the site of FMC Devens.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Article I, Section 8, Clause 17, of the United States Constitution authorizes the federal government to exercise jurisdiction over lands it acquires within a state. Clause 17 provides: "The Congress shall have power * * * to exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases" over "all Places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be" for forts, docks, and "other needful buildings." This Clause authorizes the United States to exercise either exclusive legislative jurisdiction (displacing state authority) or concurrent legislative jurisdiction (establishing concurrent federal and state authority) over federal property, where state consent has been given. See James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. 134, 148 (1937).

Certain acts violate federal criminal law wherever they are committed and, therefore, are uniformly subject to federal prosecution. However, other acts do not violate federal criminal law unless they are committed in areas within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States, including areas over which the United States has acquired legislative jurisdiction pursuant to Clause 17. See 18 U.S.C. § 7. Laws that apply only in areas of federal legislative jurisdiction include: 18 U.S.C. §§ 81 (arson); 113 (assaults); 114 (maiming); 117 (domestic assault by habitual offender); 661 (theft); 662 (receiving stolen property); 1111 (murder); 1112 (manslaughter); 1113 (attempt to commit murder or manslaughter); 1201 (kidnaping); 1363 (destruction of property); 1801 (video voyeurism); and 2111 (robbery). Where Congress has not specifically criminalized particular conduct, the Assimilative Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. § 13, makes it a federal crime to commit any act that would be punishable under the criminal laws of the relevant state.

The Bureau of Prisons routinely seeks concurrent legislative jurisdiction at federal correctional institutions to ensure that the United States can prosecute conduct, especially inmate conduct, that violates such statutes. The Bureau typically seeks concurrent, rather than exclusive, jurisdiction so that the United States will have a choice whether to prosecute a particular crime or to leave the prosecution to state authorities. State cession of concurrent jurisdiction allows the United States to enforce all federal criminal laws, without displacing state enforcement authorities.

FMC Devens is an administrative facility housing male offenders requiring specialized or long-term medical or mental health care. FMC Devens also has a satellite camp housing minimum security male inmates. The lands comprising FMC Devens were formerly part of Devens Army Base. Administrative control of this portion of the Devens Army Base was transferred by the Army to the Bureau in 1997. The Bureau is now seeking to establish concurrent federal legislative jurisdiction over offenses occurring at FMC Devens, with the concurrence of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. The Criminal Division agrees that federal authorities should have jurisdiction over any offenses committed by inmates at FMC Devens because state and local authorities often decline to address non-federal offenses that occur on the site.

Consent by the state is a prerequisite to the federal government's acquisition of jurisdiction under Article I, Section 8, Clause 17. See James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. at 147, 148. Cession by a state of legislative jurisdiction is not effective until an authorized federal officer accepts the jurisdiction. See 40 U.S.C. § 3112, formerly 40 U.S.C. § 255. Only the U.S. Attorney General is authorized to accept legislative jurisdiction on behalf of the Bureau.

MASSACHUSETTS' CESSION OF CONCURRENT LEGISLATIVE JURISDICTION

The Bureau of Prisons began efforts to acquire concurrent legislative jurisdiction over the land in Harvard, Massachusetts that comprises FMC Fort Devens in 1998. The effort was unusually difficult and lengthy. Massachusetts ultimately ceded concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over that land to the United States by an act of the Massachusetts legislature of December 27, 2004. See Chapter 481 of the Acts of 2004. This was subsequently signed into law by the Governor of Massachusetts on January 6, 2005. (These lands are described in Exhibit A to the attached acceptance letter.)

CONCLUSION AND RECOMMENDATION:

Acceptance of concurrent legislative jurisdiction at the FMC Devens site would allow the United States authority to enforce and prosecute certain federal laws, as well as other, non-federal offenses, without displacing state authority.

The Bureau considers it a priority to obtain concurrent jurisdiction over FMC Devens by acceptance at the earliest possible date, to avert the risk that the United States may lack jurisdiction to prosecute offenses that may occur prior to acceptance.

Should you have any questions regarding this matter, please have your staff contact Justin Smith, of the Environment & Natural Resources Division's Law and Policy Section, at 514-0750, or George Younger, of the Federal Bureau of Prisons' Office of General Counsel, at 353-4595.

Washington, D.C.

The Honorable Mitt Romney
Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts
Boston, MA 02133

Dear Governor Romney:

On behalf of the United States, pursuant to 40 U.S.C. § 3112 (formerly 40 U.S.C. § 255), I accept concurrent legislative jurisdiction over the lands described in Exhibit A (formerly part of Devens Army Base and now comprising the Federal Medical Center Devens) from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as provided in Chapter 481 of the Acts of 2004, approved on January 6, 2005. Administrative control of this federal property was transferred by the Army to the Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Prisons, in 1997.

It is deemed highly desirable and in the interests of sound administration of federal penal institutions that the United States have concurrent jurisdiction over this property. While the Massachusetts session law referred to above cedes such jurisdiction, federal law requires a specific acceptance on behalf of the United States, which this letter provides. See 40 U.S.C. § 3112. This acceptance of cession of concurrent jurisdiction from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to the United States is effective as of the above date.

Please execute the acknowledgment of receipt of this letter in duplicate and return one original to: Justin Smith, United States Department of Justice, Environment and Natural Resources Division, Law and Policy Section, P.O. MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE Acting ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL 8/2/06

FROM: Sue Ellen Wooldridge
Assistant Attorney General

SUBJECT: Acceptance of Concurrent Legislative Jurisdiction at Bureau of Prisons Facilities in California

PURPOSE: To obtain the signature of Attorney General Gonzales

TIMETABLE: Review and signature without delay

SYNOPSIS: The Attorney General should accept concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction, on behalf of the United States and from the State of California over the lands comprising the United States Penitentiary at Atwater, the former Federal Prison Camp at Boron, the Metropolitan Detention Center at Los Angeles, the Correctional Institution at Taft, and the Federal Correctional Institution at Mendota. Acceptance of concurrent legislative jurisdiction will allow the Federal Government to enforce certain federal laws that apply only within areas under the United States' legislative jurisdiction, without displacing state enforcement authorities.

DISCUSSION: The Bureau of Prisons (Bureau) desires to renew concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over the site of the United States Penitentiary at Atwater (USP Atwater), the former Federal Prison Camp at Boron (FPC Boron), the Metropolitan Detention Center at Los Angeles (MDC Los Angeles), and the Correctional Institution at Taft (CI Taft), and acquire concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over the site of the Federal Correctional Institution at Mendota (FCI Mendota).

At the Environment Division's request, the State recently renewed cession of concurrent criminal jurisdiction to the United States over the first four sites, and ceded concurrent criminal jurisdiction to the United States over FCI Mendota. Under federal law, these cessions do not take effect until (1) accepted by the Attorney General and (2) the cession documents have been recorded in the County land records where the respective lands are located. This memorandum recommends that the Attorney General accept concurrent legislative jurisdiction on behalf of the United States for the sites.

RECOMMENDATION: I recommend that you sign the enclosed letter to the Chairman of the California State Lands Commission, accepting concurrent criminal jurisdiction for the sites of USP Atwater, FPC Boron, MDC Los Angeles, CI Taft, and FCI Mendota.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Article I, Section 8, Clause 17, of the United States Constitution authorizes the federal government to exercise jurisdiction over lands it acquires within a state. Clause 17 provides: "The Congress shall have power * * * to exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases" over "all Places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be" for forts, docks, and "other needful buildings." This Clause authorizes the United States to exercise either exclusive legislative jurisdiction (displacing state authority) or concurrent legislative jurisdiction (establishing concurrent federal and state authority) over federal property, where state consent has been given. See James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. 134, 148 (1937).

Certain acts violate federal criminal law wherever they are committed and, therefore, are uniformly subject to federal prosecution. However, other acts do not violate federal criminal law unless they are committed in areas within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States, including areas over which the United States has acquired legislative jurisdiction pursuant to Clause 17. See 18 U.S.C. § 7. Laws that apply only in areas of federal legislative jurisdiction include: 18 U.S.C. §§ 81 (arson); 113 (assaults); 114 (maiming); 117 (domestic assault by habitual offender); 661 (theft); 662 (receiving stolen property); 1111 (murder); 1112 (manslaughter); 1113 (attempt to commit murder or manslaughter); 1201 (kidnaping); 1363 (destruction of property); 1801 (video voyeurism); and 2111 (robbery). Where Congress has not specifically criminalized particular conduct, the Assimilative Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. § 13, makes it a federal crime to commit any act that would be punishable under the criminal laws of the relevant state.

The Bureau of Prisons routinely seeks concurrent legislative jurisdiction at federal correctional institutions to ensure that the United States can prosecute conduct, especially inmate conduct, that violates such statutes. The Bureau typically seeks concurrent, rather than exclusive, jurisdiction so that the United States will have a choice whether to prosecute a particular crime or to leave the prosecution to state authorities. State cession of concurrent jurisdiction allows the United States to enforce all federal criminal laws, without displacing state enforcement authorities.

Consent by the state is a prerequisite to the federal government's acquisition of jurisdiction under Article I, Section 8, Clause 17. See James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. at 147, 148. Cession by a state of legislative jurisdiction is not effective until an authorized federal officer accepts the jurisdiction. See 40 U.S.C. § 3112, formerly 40 U.S.C. § 255. Only the U.S. Attorney General is authorized to accept legislative jurisdiction on behalf of the Bureau.

CALIFORNIA'S CESSION OF CONCURRENT LEGISLATIVE JURISDICTION

California law authorizes the California State Lands Commission to cede concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction to the United States for periods not to exceed five years. See Cal. Gov't Code § 126(e). On September 17, 2001, the Commission approved the cession of concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction to the United States over the lands comprising FPC Boron, CI Taft, MDC Los Angeles, and USP Atwater. (These lands are described in Exhibit A to the attached acceptance letter.) On April 17, 2006, the Commission approved the renewed cession of concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over these sites, as well as the cession of concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over the land comprising FCI Mendota.

California law sets certain conditions for the transfer of jurisdiction. Of relevance here, it provides that the State "reserves jurisdiction over the land, water, and use of water with full power to control and regulate the acquisition, use, control, and distribution of water" and that the state "exempts and reserves * * * to the state all deposits of minerals." Cal. Gov't Code §§ 126(g), (h). In the past, the United States has accepted legislative jurisdiction notwithstanding these provisions. Approximately 10 years ago, staff counsel for the California State Lands Commission provided the Department of Justice with a legal analysis of these reservations, based on available legislative history. The Commission's counsel concluded:

> It is my opinion that these [reservations] should be read to apply only to those situations where the State of California has conveyed fee title to the United States. * * * they should not be considered conditions precedent to the transfer of legislative jurisdiction. There is nothing to suggest that the Legislature intended that the United States convey its water rights or mineral estates as a condition for a cession. Nor is there anything to suggest that this is or ever was the Commission's administrative practice.

Letter from James R. Frey to Michael E. Wall (May 3, 1996) (Exhibit B to the attached acceptance letter). The acceptance letter would confirm our understanding that these state-law reservations do not require the United States to convey any water rights or mineral estates as a condition of this cession.

CONCLUSION:

Acceptance of concurrent legislative jurisdiction at the site of five Bureau of Prison sites would allow the United States authority to enforce certain federal laws at these five sites, without displacing state authority.

This matter is time sensitive because federal concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over the lands comprising FPC Boron, CI Taft, MDC Los Angeles, and USP Atwater will lapse in October, 2006, pursuant to the sunset provision in Cal. Gov't Code § 126(e). Should jurisdiction lapse, the United States cannot enforce certain federal laws, including the Assimilative Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. § 13, at the facilities.

Should you have any questions regarding this matter, please have your staff contact Justin Smith, of the Environment & Natural Resources Division's Law and Policy Section, at 514-0750, or George Younger, of the Federal Bureau of Prisons' Office of General Counsel, at 353-4595.

Mr. Steve Westly
Chairman
California State Lands Commission
100 Howe Avenue, Suite 100 South
Sacramento, CA 95825-8202

Dear Chairman Westly:

On April 17, 2006, acting pursuant to Cal. Gov't Code § 126, the California State Lands Commission (Commission) approved the cession of concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction to the United States over the lands comprising the United States Penitentiary at Atwater; the former Federal Prison Camp at Boron; the Metropolitan Detention Center at Los Angeles; the Correctional Institution (also previously known as the Federal Correctional Institution) at Taft; and the Federal Correctional Institution at Mendota.

On behalf of the United States pursuant to 40 U.S.C. § 3112, I accept concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over the specified lands. (See Exhibits A1– A5, attached.) My acceptance shall take effect upon recording of certified copies of the cession documents of the Commission in the office of the county recorder of each county where the lands are situated.

The United States understands that Cal. Gov't Code § 126 does not require the United States to convey any water rights or mineral estate as a condition of this cession. This understanding conforms to the 1996 interpretation of section 126 provided by counsel to the California State Lands Commission.

Please execute the acknowledgment of receipt of this letter in duplicate and return one original to: Justin Smith, United States Department of Justice, Environment & Natural Resources Division, Law and Policy Section, P.O. Box 4390, Washington, D.C. 20044-4390. Should you need any further information, please have your staff contact Mr. Smith at (202) 514-0570.

I appreciate your assistance.

SUBJECT: Senior Executive Service (SES) Bonus and Pay Adjustment Policy

PURPOSE: To obtain your approval on SES performance bonus and pay adjustment policy and to issue guidance to Components

TIMETABLE: As soon as possible.

DISCUSSION: This is to request your approval to issue SES operating guidance to Component Performance Review Boards (PRB) including the Department's 2006 performance bonus and pay adjustment policy.

In addition, this is to request approval to limit the Department's total performance bonus pool to 7 percent of career SES pay (statutory limitation is 10 percent) and limit the total number of career bonuses to 50 percent of the career executives (the 2005 government-wide average was 66.5 percent versus 53.5 percent for the Department of Justice).

Upon your approval, the Justice Management Division's Personnel Staff will issue implementing guidance which will include bonus and merit-based salary adjustment ranges based on performance rating levels. Lastly, all bonus and pay recommendations will be submitted to you for approval after being reviewed by the Senior Executive Resources Board.

His Excellency
Wu Aiying
Minister of Justice of the People's Republic of China
Beijing

Dear Mr. Minister:

I write to inform you of the court of appeals' decision in the case of Yang Rong v. Liaoning Province, No. 05-7030 (D.C. Cir.), a case about which we have previously corresponded. The court's decision is favorable to the Chinese Government.

You previously wrote to me to express the Chinese Government's position in the Yang Rong case and to ask the United States to consider filing a statement of interest in that case. I responded to your letter on May 15, 2006, explaining that, as a procedural matter, it would be inappropriate for the United States to file a statement of interest, because the parties had already filed briefs and presented oral argument and were awaiting the court of appeals' decision. I also explained that, after careful consideration of the matter, the Department of State advised us that it would be inappropriate for the United States to file a statement of interest at that time.

On July 7, 2006, the court of appeals issued an opinion affirming the district court's dismissal of Yang Rong's suit against Liaoning Province. The court decided that the Chinese Government is immune from suit in this case under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, a United States law providing foreign sovereigns immunity from suit in the United States unless the case falls under one of the limited exceptions stated in the law. Enclosed is a copy of the court of appeals' decision for your review.

Under the United States' legal system, it is possible for a plaintiff to seek further review of such a decision. However, the court of appeals' decision is a substantial victory for China's position.

I hope that this information is helpful to your understanding of this matter, and I look forward to future cooperation between China and the United States on issues of mutual concern.

Sincerely,

Alberto R. Gonzales
Attorney General

MEMORANDUM FOR THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL 7/28/06

FROM: Peter D. Keisler
Assistant Attorney General
Civil Division

SUBJECT: Availability and Proposed Uses of the Civil Division's Unobligated Balances

As requested in your May 1, 2006, memorandum, I am submitting estimates of the unobligated prior year balances that are available for transfer from Civil Division accounts to the Department's Working Capital Fund and to the Automated Litigation Support (ALS) no-year account.[1] The Civil Division can transfer $11,580,000 to these accounts. Attachment 1 summarizes the amounts for each year.

The Civil Division seeks to apply these balances to address major Division and Department needs: $8,640,000 for the Spent Nuclear Fuel litigation, and $2,700,000 to invest in the next generation of telecommunications for the litigating divisions.

The Spent Nuclear Fuel litigation needs $8,640,000 for automated litigation support services. To date, over 66 suits have been filed by nuclear power utilities that are seeking damages for the government's failure to begin acceptance of spent nuclear fuel. Nuclear utility industry publications have estimated that claims for the first ten years of delay will exceed $50 billion by 2008. The litigation is extremely active, with six cases scheduled for trial through FY 2007. While the Department has consistently supported funding increases for this litigation, Congress has not appropriated the requested funding. Attachment 2 provides background on this requirement.

[1] The Department's annual appropriation allows for up to $10,000,000 in unobligated balances to remain available to the litigating divisions for litigation support contracts. The Department uses this provision to transfer these balances into an account ("the ALS No-Year Account") established for this purpose. Balances transferred to this account are then distributed to meet urgent, but unfunded, litigation support requirements. The column of the chart in Attachment 1 labeled "Remaining 'Capacity' of the ALS No-Year Account to Accept Funds" shows $10 million minus the amount already deposited to this account each fiscal year.

The $2,700,000 we are requesting for telecommunications will fund replacement networks as the current Metropolitan Area Network is phased out. The replacement networks will incorporate redundancy, as well as firewalls and intrusion detection technology to ensure security. We do not know exactly how much funding will be required or when it will be needed. However, we do know that the Civil Division and other litigating divisions will be migrating soon. The FY 2007 budget pending before Congress does not include funding for this requirement. Consequently, either the components will have to absorb the costs by taking cuts elsewhere, or alternative funding sources will need to be developed. The transfer we are proposing would provide such an alternative for Civil and the other divisions.

I would be happy to meet with you to discuss this subject.

The Forgotten Goal of Civil Justice: A Foundation for Common Sense in Daily Life

by Philip K. Howard

The debate over civil justice in recent decades has focused on its fairness. Tort reformers complain of "lawsuit abuse" and "judicial hell-holes."[1] Defenders of the current system talk of the need to protect the little guy against corporate abuses, and extol the jury system as "Democracy in Action."[2]

In this paper I argue that civil justice has a broader goal than fairness: to provide a foundation for reasonable choices in a free society. The main defect in the current system is not that juries are unfair or that there is an avalanche of litigation -- about which there is sharp disagreement[3] -- but that law does not offer predictable guidelines of who can sue for what. The system of justice offers recourse not only against abusive and negligent conduct, but also against Tort claims, a subset of civil claims, declined 9% since 1992 because traffic claims, which make up the bulk of tort claims, declined 14% during that period. The decline in traffic claims is attributable to the rise of no-fault insurance and other reforms designed to reduce the volume of those claims. Between 1975 and 2002, all tort claims increased a total of 38%, including the 9% decrease since 1992.)

conduct that most people consider reasonable. Civil justice tolerates, and arguably encourages, inconsistent verdicts for similar disputes. The law offers few guidelines on standards of care or on the potential exposure when there is a dispute.

Civil justice has changed markedly in 40 years.[4] These changes can be traced in part to a shift in judicial philosophy: whatever authority judges believed they held withered with the rise of the "legal process" movement in the 1960s, in which their role was reconceived as one of a neutral referee.[5] The effect was not to achieve neutrality, however, but to leave a vacuum. That vacuum has been filled by an ever-broadening range of private legal claims and threats, giving rise to a lawsuit culture in which ordinary interaction is now weighed down by legal considerations.

The main harm to society is not the total cost of verdicts, but that Americans no longer feel free to act reasonably. Legal fear has infected the culture. Paranoid doctors focus on avoiding lawsuits.[6] Recreational activities are cancelled.[7] Teachers have trouble maintaining

The solution I propose is not to set arbitrary limits on lawsuits but to shift responsibility back to judges to decide, as a matter of law, the boundaries of reasonable claims. To re-instill the public trust in civil justice, judges need to provide people with a sense of who can sue for what.

The authority of judges to assert social norms, although rarely discussed today, is well-established in common law jurisprudence, and was the central theme of those we hold up as lions of the common law, such as Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. and Benjamin Cardozo. [11]

The question of what should be decided by a judge versus a jury, in truth, did not matter much until recent decades. Under prevailing social mores, it didn't occur to people to sue for ordinary accidents or workplace disagreements. But now that perception has radically changed: any disagreement or accident is a potential lawsuit.

The need to reassert judicial authority is not a matter of abstract preference for a particular judicial philosophy. The need to reassert judicial authority is profoundly practical: Because Americans no longer trust civil justice, they have lost their freedom to make reasonable daily choices.

"What really matters is this, that the judge is under a duty... to maintain a relation between law and morals, between the precepts of jurisprudence and those of reason and good conscience."

Civil justice is conceived today primarily as a dispute resolution mechanism. But civil justice also has a broader goal -- as the foundation for reasonable choices in a free society. Holmes stated that, "the first requirement of a sound body of law" is to uphold reasonable community norms. [12]

Derek Bok, former Harvard President and Law School Dean, observed that lawsuits "often have their greatest effect on people who are neither parties to the litigation nor even aware that it is going on." [13] The news last year that someone received a large verdict in a sledding accident had the natural effect of causing other towns to declare that they no would no longer permit winter sports on town property. [14] No court, however, made a ruling that sledding is an unreasonable risk. Who is representing the interests of the citizens who want to enjoy winter sports?

Law is considered the foundation of a free society not because it seeks to maximize possible legal claims -- as one observer noted, "America did not sue its way to greatness" [15] -- but because it sets forth legal guideposts defining the scope of our freedom. People feel free to interact reasonably with others because the system of law will put criminals in jail, enforce contracts by their terms, and require a negligent person to compensate the person injured. Civil law protects the good as well as prosecutes the bad: citizens in a free society should be confident that if they act reasonably, their freedom to do so will be defended. As long as you act within those guideposts, you are free: free to follow your instincts simply because you choose to.[16] "The end of law," John Locke said, "is not to abolish or restrain, but to preserve freedom."[17]

Today, at least in areas such as tort law, America's civil justice system is not providing these guideposts of right and wrong. There exists a widespread perception, generally accurate, that any injured or angry person can haul another person into court over any accident or disagreement and put that claim to a jury. There is also a perception that the amounts for which people may sue, if not unlimited, are subject to amorphous guidelines and few limits.

Current legal orthodoxy is that the availability of a lawsuit encourages people to act reasonably. Indeed, by making people potentially liable for their negligence, law provides incentives for reasonable conduct. What people seem to have forgotten is that the converse is also true: Allow lawsuits against reasonable behavior and pretty soon people no longer feel free

[16] Prosser and Keeton note that an essential aspect of freedom is being free from "restraint and ...undue consideration for the interests and claims of others." See Prosser and Keeton, supra:

> Individuals have many interests for which they claim protection from the law, and which the law will recognize as worthy of protection...Individuals wish to be secure in their persons against harm and interference, not only as to their physical integrity, but as to their freedom to move about and their peace of mind. They want food and clothing, homes and land and goods, money, automobiles and entertainment, and they want to be secure and free from disturbance in the right to have these things, or to acquire them if they can. They want freedom to work and deal with others, and protection against interference with their private lives, their family relations, and their honor and reputation. They are concerned with freedom of thought and action, with opportunities for economic gain, and with pleasant and advantageous relations with others. The catalogue of their interests might be as long as the list of legitimate human desires; and not the least of them is the desire to do what they please without restraint and without undue consideration for the interests and claims of others.

to act reasonably.

An "open season" conception of justice has enormous appeal if people are thinking of getting back at others or looking for comfort in blaming others, but it also has infected daily interaction in society with distrust. People understand, as Professor Robert Kagan observed, that easy justice "can be used against the trustworthy, too. An equal opportunity weapon, it can be invoked by the misguided, the mendacious, and the malevolent, as well as by the mistreated."[18]

The ultimate test of a system of justice, Justice Cardozo suggested, is how people feel about it.[19] By that standard, civil justice is not only a failure, but is actively tearing at the fabric of our society.

Distrust of Justice and Social Decline

In almost every area of social interaction, Americans no longer feel free to act reasonably. The effects of this distrust have been subject of extensive studies in healthcare, which have concluded that the legal system is a prime contributor to the crisis of cost and quality. Doctors and nurses no longer feel comfortable acting on their best judgment or being candid with each other.

- It is the ubiquitous practice of physicians to order tests that they do not believe are medically necessary, driving up the costs of healthcare.[20] In a 2002 Harris Poll,

78% of physicians admitted ordering unnecessary tests and 94% said that other physicians did.[21] A recent survey in Pennsylvania found that 93% reported practicing defensive medicine, and 92% reported ordering unneeded tests and diagnostic procedures and making unnecessary referrals.[22] Defenders of this practice say that more tests mean better healthcare, but 45 million Americans lack health insurance in part because individuals and small businesses cannot afford healthcare premiums that have skyrocketed.[23]

- The Institute of Medicine has concluded that "patient safety is also hindered through the liability system and the threat of malpractice."[24] Doctors are scared to be candid with each other, leading to unnecessary and often tragic errors. They avoid using email because it leaves a written record. They are reluctant to admit fault even in cases of near misses, where no harm is done to the patient.
- The legal system makes it difficult to hold bad doctors accountable. Doctors who

U.S. spending per person is "just over" double that of persons in Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United Kingdom.The United States spends a greater percent of gross domestic product on health care than any other major industrialized nation. American healthcare now costs almost twice as much as that in other Western countries. In 2001, the United States spent 14.1 percent of the GDP on health care. This translates to $1.4 trillion, up 8.7 percent from 2000. make mistakes can drag out litigation for years, often compelling an unfair settlement. Inept doctors often successfully avoid efforts to revoke their licenses by hiring a lawyer and threatening to sue for defamation.

Distrust of the legal system has transformed public schools. Teachers struggle to maintain order in the classroom because they face threats of being dragged into hearings. The degradation of the school culture, as described by Prof. Richard Arum in his book, Judging School Discipline, is linked to requirements to "prove" the correctness of decisions in an adversarial proceeding.[25] The disrespect accorded teachers is shocking. Polls and focus groups show that educators will do almost anything to avoid the unpleasantness of legal hearings. In America today, teachers will not put an arm around a crying child for fear of being sued for an unwanted sexual touching.

Recreation has been transformed. Playgrounds have been stripped of anything athletic—for example, jungle gyms and seesaws. Playgrounds are so boring, according to some experts, that no child over the age of four wants to go in them.[26] I was on a panel convened by Health Secretary Tommy Thompson in 2002, at which a group of experts concluded that re-instilling a culture of physical fitness was essential in order to address the surge in childhood obesity. Forty years ago, JFK's President's Council on Youth Fitness, with the same goal, called for installing monkey bars and other athletic equipment in playgrounds. Now, because of fear of liability, they've largely been ripped out.

Many other ordinary aspects of growing-up have disappeared. Lakes were closed to swimming as the word got out that you might get sued. Field trips are cancelled.[27] 'Recently, a school in Brooklyn had their beach day near Coney Island—the children were prohibited from going in the water for fear that someone might be liable if there were an accident.[28] A new book, Last Child in the Woods, addresses the cost to society when children lose the experience of spontaneous play and exploration.[29]

Business life has been transformed in many ways. "Foreign businessmen express amazement," Derek Bok observed, at "a system that exposes the entrepreneur to legal challenge so easily and on so many fronts, a system that lends itself so readily to harassment, obstruction, and delay." It is the regular practice of firms, including my own law firm, not to give references for fear of liability. Last year, a nurse admitted to killing 42 people in a string of hospitals in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. He was recognized as a troubled and ineffective nurse and would soon be fired, but would get rehired at another hospital because no one would give him a bad reference. As one hospital administrator admitted, "we're prevented from telling one another what we know out of fear, quite frankly, of being sued."[30]

Symptoms of the distrust of justice are all around us. Warning labels are found on virtually every product. Billions of coffee cups contain the helpful legend "Caution: Contents are Hot." A recent winner of the annual "wacky warning" contest was a 5-inch fishing lure with the following legend: "Harmful if Swallowed."[31] The warnings cost little or nothing, apologists say. But that's not correct either. When every product has a warning, the effect is a version of the child crying wolf -- consumers are less likely to pay attention to the warnings that really matter.

In almost all areas of social interaction -- hospitals, schools, recreation, child-rearing activities, even churches and synagogues -- Americans no longer feel comfortable acting on their reasonable judgment. The reason, polls confirm, is distrust of American Justice. A new Harris Poll, commissioned for this conference, found the following:

- 76% of Americans strongly or somewhat agree that people have become so fearful of frivolous lawsuits that they are discouraged from performing normal activities. [32]
- 83% of Americans strongly or somewhat agree that the system of justice makes it too easy to make invalid claims. [33]
- 94% strongly or somewhat agree that there is a tendency for people to threaten legal action when something goes wrong.[34]

The lack of confidence in civil justice is echoed in numerous other polls.[36]

Defenders of our system of justice say that Americans are irrational, and that the crisis has been manufactured (i) by irresponsible media that makes headlines of occasional rogue jury verdicts and (ii) by a calculated scare campaign of tort reformers. It's correct that the media emphasizes anything that might shock or titillate the public.[37] This bad habit has been observed in the media since colonial days, and, in the land of the First Amendment, it is hard to know what to do about it. It is correct also that reformers have gone of the stump to tell the public that the litigation system is unfair.[38] Probably the biggest promoters of "jackpot justice," however, are the plaintiffs' lawyers. One need only look through the Yellow Pages, or look at billboards, or listen to AM radio, to be barraged by lawyer advertisements encouraging Americans to believe that they can sue for anything.[39] The unavoidable message of those ads is that you might be on the receiving end of one of those lawsuits.

The data on the amount of litigation and the trend in verdicts are notoriously unreliable because fewer than 3% of all cases ever get resolved at trial, and the overwhelming number of claims are settled or disposed of in some other way.[40] Legal threats don't show up in the numbers at all. The best data appear to confirm that the amounts awarded by juries have increased and that the number of claims—at least of certain types— is also up.[41] for example, that the system of justice will affirmatively protect them if a baseless claim is brought. In the face of uncertainty, individuals often give disproportionate weight to risk—Nobel laueate Daniel Kahneman famously explained this phenomenon as the "overweighting of low probabilities," which helps explain why people think about sharks before swimming in the ocean, even though chances of being attacked are negligible.[46]

Being sued also is not likely, but horrifying and unpredictable, and there are many more potential plaintiffs in our immediate daily lives than there are sharks. Many doctors say that they view every patient as a potential plaintiff. Once people learn that someone was exposed to a lawsuit for some ordinary life activity, that activity becomes a risk to avoid.[47] I could find no court that held that a seesaw was unreasonably dangerous, or that putting suntan lotion on children would subject you to liability, but Americans now understand that one injured or disappointed person can unilaterally drag you through a legal process for years. Nothing could be easier, when something goes wrong, than to come up with a theory of what someone might have done differently.

Getting Beyond Tort Reform

The debate over "tort reform" in the last two decades has focused not on the effectiveness of justice as the foundation for reasonable daily choices, but whether civil justice achieves fairness in particular cases.[49] As Derek Bok noted 20 years ago, there is a tendency to concentrate on the "plight of individual litigants and ignore[] the effects on the system as a whole."[50]

Tort reformers talk about the "lawsuit lottery," and point to jurisdictions that are notoriously tilted toward claimants and characterize them as "judicial hell-holes" and "magic jurisdictions" where plaintiffs' lawyers can bring baseless or excessive claims with a high probability of success.[51] The focus throughout is fairness. "Is it fair to get a couple of million dollars from a restaurant because you spilled a cup of hot coffee on yourself?"[52] As the Chamber of Commerce asks on its website, "How fair are your courts?"[53]

Actual reform proposals have not questioned the basic functioning of the system, however. As Professor Robert Kagan put it, tort reform has only "nibbled at the edges."[54] Indeed, many tort reformers have gone out of their way to suggest that the problem can be fixed with a few tweaks: "all it takes is a few of those magic jurisdictions to distort the whole system,"[55] said a representative of the National Association of Manufacturers. "A minor change in procedures—the class action bill now pending before Congress—can make that impossible by driving those kinds of mass claims into federal court."[56] (That legislation—the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005—was passed earlier this year.)

The medical profession has thrown its energy into an effort to "cap" non-economic damages at $250,000. If ever enacted, this would certainly moderate malpractice insurance premiums. But most doctors acknowledge that "caps" do little to alleviate the extreme distrust that doctors harbor towards the system. For example, limiting damages awarded for pain and suffering is of little help to an obstetrician who could not have caused a baby's birth defects but is nonetheless found liable for millions of dollars of "economic" damages representing a lifetime of care.[57]

[57] No tort reform of which I am aware address the reliability of justice. A majority of states have passed laws that limit defendant's exposure in personal injury actions; for example, by limiting non-economic damages or joint and several liability. But these citizens in take states still seem to distrust the system of justice.

reform portray tort reformers as special interests trying to rig the system their way. Joanne Doroshow, a founder of the Center for Justice and Democracy, put it this way: "there has been an increase in efforts to eviscerate the civil justice system and make sure corporations do not get sued for anything they do wrong." [58]

Opponents of tort reform also focus on fairness, which they define as the right to have every case decided by a jury. Robert S. Peck, the head of the Center for Constitutional Litigation, extols the virtues of modern civil justice this way:

> There, an individual, neither wealthy nor well-connected, can haul a huge multinational conglomerate into court and hold it accountable for its wrongful and harmful actions.[59]

"I trust the jury system and I trust the American people and their common sense," as trial lawyer Richard Scruggs put it, "far more than the National Association of Manufacturers to protect the American public."[60]

The impact of justice on the workings of a society is only touched on tangentially. Plaintiffs' lawyers often assert that lawsuits serve a "regulatory function," but when the results vary from case to case, it's hard to find the regulatory rule.[61]

The populist rhetoric by trial lawyers about "trust the American people" doesn't seem quite accurate. As Walter Olson recounts in vivid detail in "The Rule of Lawyers" (Truman Talley/St. Martin's 2003) entrepreneurial lawyers practice discrimination overtly; manuals explain that Mexican Americans are "passive" and "Orientals tend to go along with the majority." The plaintiff lawyers use focus groups to figure out which juries would be most sympathetic to their arguments. In the silicone breast implant cases, for example, they discovered that blue collar men who like big bosoms would be most likely, out of guilt, to return verdicts for the plaintiffs. cite.

The focus on fairness has proved unproductive on many levels. In any given case, the question of fairness can easily be argued either way. Take the McDonald's hot coffee case, the poster child of "lawsuit abuse." There, an elderly woman was badly burned when she put her coffee cup between her legs, and it spilled as her daughter drove away from the drive-through window. That's her fault, it's easy to say. On the other hand, McDonald's coffee was brewed - 20 degrees hotter than other restaurants. Why should the drive-in window sell coffee that's so hot? Why not, aren't drivers grown up?

Arguing about fairness quickly turns into a version of a playground spat. Tort reformers talk about the need to limit frivolous lawsuits. Who can be against that? Defenders of the system talk about protecting the little guy against corporate wrongdoers. Who can be against that?

Any functional system of civil justice, of course, should accomplish both goals: it should reliably get rid of frivolous lawsuits, and it should also effectively protect the little guy against a corporate wrongdoer. What's missing in the debate is any coherent vision of how a system of justice should work.

The Responsibility of Judges vs. Juries.

> Ad questionem facti non respondent judices . . .

Just as both sides to the tort reform debate have focused on fairness rather than the broader effects of civil justice on society, so too have they assumed that juries, not judges, have the responsibility of deciding whether conduct constitutes negligence or an unreasonable risk. Under current judicial orthodoxy, judges believe they should lean over backwards to put every case to a jury. One standard often quoted is Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41 (1957) admonishing lower courts not to dismiss any claim unless "it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to recover."[62]

Any effort at legal reform is routinely resisted as trespassing on the constitutional right of trial by jury. But the role of the civil jury is generally misunderstood and, to the public, probably confused with the jury's role in criminal cases. In criminal prosecutions, juries play a critical role as our protection against the abuses of government power. Juries are our defense against state coercion: no one can be convicted to jail unless a jury decides they're guilty. But in a civil case, where citizens can use the justice system as an offensive weapon, the role of the jury depends upon whether the issues should be determined as a matter of law or as a matter of disputed fact.

The Seventh Amendment, which states that the "right of trial by jury shall be preserved," underscores this fact-law distinction. It defines the civil jury right as applying to "suits in common law" and ends by saying that "no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined...than according to the rules of the common law."[63] Judges declare the standards of law that affect all of society; juries find disputed facts in the particular case.[64]

While most lawyers assume today that the Seventh Amendment is an automatic pass to the jury, what constituted a "suit at common law" in 1791 was sharply limited. There was no cause of action for negligence, for example, until judges in the 19th century made rulings creating this new cause of action. Some issues -- say, interpretation of a statute -- are clearly law. Others are clearly issues of fact: "credibility determinations, the weighing of evidence and the drawing of legitimate inferences from the facts are jury functions, not those of a judge."[65]

Determining whether someone acted reasonably involves mixed questions of law and fact. Any claim for negligence, for example, usually involves what is reasonable conduct in the circumstances. The almost universal practice in tort cases is to give the claim to the jury. One study found that courts show "extreme vigilance against treading on contested fact issues or mixes questions of law and fact - even arguable ones - reserving them for evidentiary hearings . . .. This was especially true in cases applying indeterminate legal standards, such as reasonableness."[66] Most courts do not even pay attention to the question of what should be decided as a matter of fact or law.

> There has been ... a strong tendency to let all issues go to the jury without discriminating among them. Judges may see this not only as conventional, but also as convenient, because it reduces judicial effort and the risk of reversal.[67]

The general practice of American courts is summed up by a sign that once hung over the federal courtroom door in New Orleans: "No spitting. No summary judgment."[68]

There is a different tradition of civil justice, however, that, at least in tort law, would dramatically increase the responsibility of judges. In this tradition, articulated most notably by Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., the overriding goal of civil justice is to provide guidance and protection to society as a whole. Instead of acting as referees over a neutral process, judges have the obligation to make rulings of law on legal duty and standards of care. Whether seesaws are a reasonable risk would be determined by the judge as a matter of law.

This approach has been largely lost to our generation and, to most, probably seems like heresy. But the jurists that we hold up as our leading common law thinkers considered this an essential responsibility of judges. To Holmes, what constitutes reasonable conduct was a question that required a ruling of law:

> Negligence ... [is] a standard of conduct, a standard we hold the parties bound to know before-hand, and which in theory is always the same fact and not a matter dependent upon the whim of a particular jury nor the eloquence of the particular advocate.[69]

Benjamin Cardozo devoted his famous lectures in 1923 to the importance of this type of "judicial legislation":

> The judge is under a duty...to maintain a relation between law and morals, between precepts of jurisprudence and those of reason and good conscience. "it is the function of courts to keep doctrines up to date with the mores by continued restatement...This is judicial legislation, and the judge legislates at his peril. Nevertheless, it is the necessity and duty of such legislation that gives to judicial office its highest honor; and no brave and honest judge shirks the duty or fears the peril."[70]

Chief Justice Roger Traynor of the California Supreme Court, a famous liberal innovator -- he created the doctrine of strict liability for manufacturers whose products fail[71] -- emphasized the need for judges to declare rulings even in the simplest accident, and not leave standards to the "oscillating verdicts of juries."[72] When a woman hit her head on an angled ceiling while walking down a staircase, Traynor insisted that the judge determine whether it was an unreasonable hazard; in that case, "the danger is so apparent that visitors could reasonably be expected to notice it."[73]

Judges in tort claims today assume that they lack this power, but they need only look to commercial law to see the philosophy in action. In commercial law, the focus is predictability and efficiency. It is a well-established principle that judges, not juries, have the obligation to interpret standard language of contracts.[74] The Uniform Commercial Code was a legislative effort to achieve consistency.[75] Its core concepts, including ones that look very much like those of tort, including reasonableness, are often decided as a matter of law in situations where the fact patterns are likely to be repeated. America's system of commercial law, generally considered the most consistent and predictable in the world, is the bedrock of America's economic strength.

The Supreme Court in recent years has begun to emphasize the goal of legal consistency. Several important decisions, for example, emphasized the desirability of judges using summary judgment to make rulings as a matter of law. In Celotex v. Caltrett, a wrongful death asbestos case, the court starkly shifted direction from the presumption that summary dismissal should be avoided if there was a "scintilla of evidence."[76] Thus,

> Summary judgment procedure is properly regarded not as a disfavored procedural shortcut, but rather as an integral part of the federal rules as a whole, which are designed "to secure the just, speedy and inexpensive determination of every action." (quoting Fed. Rules Civ. Proc. 1.)[77]

In Markman v. Westview Instruments, Justice Souter explained the importance of consistency in patent cases:

> "...we see the importance of uniformity in the treatment of a given patent as an independent reason to allocate all issues of construction to the court. As we noted in General Elec. Co. v. Wabash Appliance Corp., "[t]he limits of a patent must be known for the protection of the patentee, the encouragement of the inventive genius of others and the assurance that the subject of the patent will be dedicated ultimately to the public."[78]

"Formerly it was held that if there was what is called a scintilla of evidence in support of a case the judge was bound to leave it to the jury, but recent decisions of high authority [referring to Celotex and Matsushita 516 U.S. 367] have established a more reasonable rule, that in every case, before the evidence is left to the jury, there is a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury could properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the onus of proof is imposed."

What discourages economic energy, Justice Souter cautioned, was a legal system that created a "zone of uncertainty:"

> "[A] zone of uncertainty which enterprise and experimentation may enter only at the risk of infringement claims would discourage invention only a little less than unequivocal foreclosure of the field," United Carbon Co. v. Binney & Smith Co., 317 U.S. 228, 236, 63 S.Ct. 165, 170, 87 L.Ed. 232 (1942), and "[t]he public [would] be deprived of rights supposed to belong to it, without being clearly told what it is that limits these rights."" Merrill v. Yeomans, 94 U.S. 568, 573, 24 L.Ed. 235 (1877).[79]

In Cooper v. Leatherman, the court held that the boundaries of punitive damages should be decided as a matter of law: ""Requiring the application of law, rather than a decisionmaker's caprice, does more than simply provide citizens notice of what actions may subject them to punishment; it also helps to assure the uniform general treatment of similarly situated persons that is the essence of law itself."""[80]

In State Farm v. Campbell, the Court went further on punitive damages, suggesting clear guidelines so that claims of punitive damages could not be used to extort settlements.[81]

> Elementary notions of fairness enshrined in our constitutional jurisprudence dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment, but also of the severity of the penalty that a State may impose..[82]

In Daubert v. Merrell Dow, the court shifted the responsibility of what constitutes credible expert testimony from jury to judge:

> ...the Rules of Evidence -- especially Rule 702 -- do assign to the trial judge the task of ensuring that an expert's testimony both rests on a reliable foundation and is relevant to the task at hand.[83]

Professor Arthur Miller, in a thorough article on the history of the fact-law distinction, is critical of what he sees as this new trend to make decisions as a matter of law on summary judgment. His main point, it seems, is that judges should not be allowed to draw on their values:

> Judges are human, and their personal sense of whether a plaintiffs' claim seems "implausible" can subconsciously infiltrate even the most careful analysis.[84]

The idea of "result-oriented" decisions based on considerations of policy strikes Professor Miller as basically unlawful because "lower courts may curtail litigants' access to trials - and obviously a jury - through arbitrary, result-oriented, or efficiency-motivated determinants at the pretrial motion stage."[85]

At bottom, Professor Miller trusts juries more than judges. But Holmes and Cardozo did not necessarily think that judges are wiser than juries. Their point is that juries can't make consistent rulings. Juries have no authority make rulings at all. Every case is a blank slate.

The idea that juries are "Democracy in Action,." a kind of mini-election with decisions made on an ad hoc basis, has populist appeal. But the effect is that civil law offers no predictability or guidance.

It is correct that, in making rulings of law, judges will necessarily have to draw on their sense of community values. Cardozo agreed that a judge can never "eliminate altogether the personal measure of the interpreter," but explained that society can't function without a ruling by someone:

> You may say there is no assurance that judges will interpret the mores of their day more wisely and truly than other men. I am not disposed to deny this, but in my view it is quite beside the point. The point is rather that this power of interpretation must be lodged somewhere...[86]

"The basic moral principle, acknowledged by every legal system we know anything about," Yale Professor Eugene Rostow once observed, "is that similar cases should be decided alike."[87] To accomplish that goal, judges must take the responsibility to draw the boundaries of reasonable lawsuits.

Restoring Reliability to Civil Justice:

Times have changed.

In many ways, the changes have been for the better. The shift in legal philosophy that began in the 1960s opened doors for broad segments of society. In our efforts to avoid abuses of authority, however, we undermined the authority needed to make common choices to run the institutions of society, including the system of civil justice.

We have created a society obsessed with law. Legal threat, once a rare event in anyone's life, is now commonplace. A recent Public Agency survey found that 78% of middle and high-school teachers in American had been threatened by their students with possible violation of their legal rights.[88] The debate over civil justice cannot take place by putting a magnifying glass over a particular dispute. Arguments about fairness, or homilies about the common sense of juries,[89] do nothing to confront the reality that legal fear has become a defining feature of our culture.

Other countries are beginning to have a similar problem of legal fear (perhaps influenced by American culture) and are proposing solutions. British Prime Minister Tony Blair recently gave a speech pointing to how fear of possible lawsuits has resulted in counterproductive behavior in England: "something is seriously awry when teachers feel unable to take children on school trips, for fear of being sued" or when a town "remove[d] hanging baskets for fear that they might fall on someone's head, even though no such accident has occurred in the 18 years they had been hanging there."[90]

The problem in the UK occurs not because of erratic juries -- the UK long ago abolished juries in most civil cases[91]-- but because judges are not focusing on the social policy implications of allowing certain claims. In an important decision in 2003, the Appellate Committee of the House of Lords took this issue on, and discussed the responsibility of judges to consider policy when deciding whether to permit claims.[92]

The case before the House of Lords could have been picked from many courts in America. On a hot day in the Cheshire region of England, a 18 year-old named John Tomlinson went for a swim in the lake of a local park.[93] Racing into the water from the beach, he dived too sharply and broke his neck on the sandy bottom. He was paralyzed for life.[94]

Mr. Tomlinson sued the Cheshire County Council for not doing more to protect against the accident. The Council, he discovered, knew about the risk. There were three or four near drownings every year. "No swimming" signs had been posted and widely ignored for over a decade. The popularity of the park—more than 160,000 visitors every year—made effective policing almost impossible. Fearful of liability, the Cheshire Council had decided to close off the lake by dumping mud on the beaches and planting reeds. But before the reeds could be planted Mr. Tomlinson had his accident. The Cheshire Council should have acted sooner, as his lawyer argued, to prevent "luring people into a deathtrap"[95] and to protect against a "siren sound strong enough to turn stout men's hearts."[96] The lower court accepted this argument because the County obviously knew the danger.

The Law Lords took the appeal and ordered the case to be dismissed. The lead opinion by Lord Hoffmann declared that whether a claim should be allowed hinged not just on whether an accident is foreseeable, but "also the social value of the activity which gave rise to the risk."[97] Permitting Mr. Tomlinson's claim, the Law Lords held, means that hundreds of thousands of people would not be able to enjoy the park: "[T]here is an important question of freedom at stake. It is unjust that the harmless recreation of responsible parents and children with buckets and spades on the beaches should be prohibited in order to comply with what is thought to be a legal duty."[98]

The County's ineffective effort to prevent swimming, instead of establishing negligence, the Lords held, demonstrated how a misguided conception of justice hurts the public. "Does the law require that all trees be cut down," Lord Hobhouse asked, "because some youth may climb them and fall?"[99] Lord Scott added, "Of course there is some risk of accidents.... But that is no reason for imposing a grey and dull safety regime on everyone."[100]

The Tomlinson decision exposes the forgotten goal in American justice. Judges have lost sight that lawsuits concern not only the particular parties to the dispute, but everyone in society.[101] The mere possibility of a lawsuit changes people's behavior.

[101] In recent years, several state Supreme Courts have emphasized the importance of public policy in making rulings of law in tort cases. In a case involving a mugging on a town beach at night, the California Supreme Court ruled that the town should not be liable because, imposing tort liability "admonishes against any use of the property whatever, thus effectively closing the area." Hayes v. State of California, 11 Cal. 3d. 469, 473 (1974). The California Supreme Court also dismissed a claim that a touch football participant was too rough because "imposition of legal liability for such conduct might well alter fundamentally, the nature of the sport." Knight v. Jewett, 3 Cal. 4th 296, 319 (1992). See generally Stephen D. Sugarman, Judges as Tort Law Unmakers: Recent California Experience with "New" Torts, 49 Depaul L. Rev. 455, 461 (1999). The New Jersey Supreme Court recently held that an accident involving

Protecting the freedom of everyone in society requires a basic shift in responsibility. Judges must delineate the boundaries of claims that implicate social policy. Judges must act as gatekeepers, as Holmes and Cardozo advocated, giving legal substance to general standards.[102]

This shift in responsibility is intended to accomplish two goals. It will spawn a body of legal opinions on standards of care and scope of duty that will begin to establish the contours of reasonable dispute. Most citizens don't eagerly await judicial slip opinions, of course, to learn how to behave. The more immediate benefit will be that the public will know that judges now see it as their job affirmatively to defend reasonable conduct.

The rule of thumb for when a legal ruling is needed should probably be this: if allowing a claim (or defense) to proceed to a jury would affect people not in the courtroom, by chilling their reasonable choices, then the judge should make a ruling of law as to the contours of the claim. Are the risks inherent in a public lake ones that society should take? Avoiding this ruling is not neutral. Not ruling, in effect, is a decision to close the lake. It doesn't matter if the jury finds no liability, because the next jury may feel differently.

Shifting this responsibility to judges to make these rulings does not implicate serious concerns of judicial authority, at least if we accept that judges in civil cases are empowered to make rulings of law based on legal policy considerations. The precedents are numerous and several state supreme courts have begun to limit tort claims on this basis.[103] Nor is there any obvious need for procedural tools other than those that already exist, such as summary judgment.[104]

But it will take years of important judicial rulings, even from the Supreme Court, to effect a change in the way most courts handle cases.[105] The power of inertia is always underestimated, and the Supreme Court has learned many times that doctrinal shift does not necessarily occur because it says it should.

Legislation would send a clearer signal. Prime Minister Blair recently announced that he will propose a new Compensation Bill that will "clarify the existing law on negligence to make clear that there is no liability in negligence for untoward incidents that could not be avoided by taking reasonable care or exercising reasonable skill."[106] Such a bill, Prime Minister Blair proposed, "will send a strong signal and...reduce risk-averse behavior by providing reassurance to those who may be concerned about possible litigation, such as volunteers, teachers and local authorities."[107]

The significance of the proposed legislation in the UK will probably not be to provide clear legislative answers, but to shift the goal of civil justice.[108] Instead of focusing only on fairness and foreseeability in a particular case, judges will likely be called upon to make rulings, as both Holmes and Lord Hoffmann suggested, based on "considerations of social advantage."[109]

Legislation to restore judicial authority in America could be in the form of a general principle, along the following lines:

> Judges shall take the responsibility of drawing the boundaries of reasonable dispute as a matter of law, applying common law principles and statutory guidelines. In making these rulings, judges should consider the impact of allowing such claims (or defenses) on the conduct of broader society.

Legislation could also address specific areas of crisis. Congress has already introduced a bill to authorize pilot projects for administrative health courts, with hearings in the Senate expected over the summer.[110]

Law is a conservative institution, as it should be. The shift towards judicial responsibility will only occur after leaders of bench and bar, exercising their considerable powers of skepticism, reach their own understanding of why this change is essential. Some of the concerns, however, can be predicted.

All citizens are entitled to their day in court, many will observe. I would go further: the courthouse doors should never be barred, even to frivolous claims. The pertinent question is how far the claim goes, i.e., whether it is subject to dismissal by motion with a legal ruling.[111] What I advocate is not taking away the right to sue, but giving substance to the right to sue.

Conservatives may object that this is "judicial activism." But there is a difference between a judge assuming legislative functions, such as taking control of a school system, and a judge dismissing an unreasonable private claim. A kind of defensive activism, where judges act as gatekeepers, is essential to keep private parties from using justice unilaterally to undermine the freedom of others in society.

The main concern, I suspect, will focus on what is called "the right to sue." The mischief caused by civil justice in the last 40 years has sustained itself so long, in my view, because of a false assumption about the nature of civil justice. Pretty much everyone seems to believe there is a constitutional right to sue for almost everything.

Suing is not an act of freedom, however. The rights of freedom that our founders gave us, such as freedom of speech, were rights against state power. Suing invokes the state's coercive power against another private citizen--if you lose, the marshal may come and take your home away. Suing is just like indicting someone, except that it is an indictment for money. We would never tolerate a prosecutor bringing a baseless charge. Nor would we allow a prosecutor to threaten the death penalty for a misdemeanor.[112] That would be using state power for extortion. Why, then, do we tolerate allowing self-interested private parties to invoke legal power for whatever they want against other free citizens?

[111] Sanctions footnote

An "open season" philosophy of justice does not enhance our constitutional rights. The point of freedom is almost exactly the opposite--that we can live our lives without being cowed by state power. When private parties use the threat of state power for their private benefit, without any moderating judicial authority, justice becomes a tool for extortion.

Holmes famously defined law as "The prophecies of what the courts will do in fact."[113] Today in America, in areas such as tort law, no one has any idea of what a court will do. What that means, I submit, is that in these areas Americans have lost the protection of law. That's why legal fear in America has reached epidemic proportions.

Shifting the responsibility to draw the boundaries of claims to judges is a major doctrinal change, comparable in scope to the shifts that occurred in the 1960s. But the shift must be bold to restore public trust. Distrust of law has corroded legitimate authority, as is apparent from any tour of the daily functioning of America's common institutions. Sooner or later, as Derek Bok observed, "our legal system [must] empower someone to keep watch and make sure that the process as a whole is meeting the needs of those whom it purportedly serves."[114]

How Adversarial Legalism Affects Behavior

Robert A. Kagan[1]

Common Good -- AEI-Brookings Conference on "Lawsuits and Liberty"
National Constitution Center, Philadelphia, PA , June 27-28, 2005

Law and lawsuits are supposed to affect behavior. They are supposed to constrain my liberty when I might exercise it ways that could harm you – so that you can exercise your liberty more freely. A problem arises when laws and legal processes unduly restrict my liberty. My argument in this paper is that American legal and regulatory processes generate high levels of legal uncertainty, so that its difficult for those subject to regulation and liability to be sure of the boundary between justifiable and unjustifiable use of their liberty. And that has socially costly, negative effects.

One way to demonstrate that is to look at American legal processes in comparative perspective. I collect comparative socio-legal studies, which provide perspective on what is distinctive about the American way of law, and on what alternative ways of law seem to be feasible. By socio-legal studies I mean systematic, often ethnographic, empirical studies of legal and regulatory processes as they actually operate. In the past 15 years, there has been a wealth of such studies, each comparing how the US and another rich democracy deal with a specific legal or policy challenge, such as adjudicating civil lawsuits, compensating individuals injured in motor vehicle accidents or sick from asbestos exposure, regulating workplace safety or nursing homes, or cleaning up old hazardous waste sites. These studies have resulted in two recurrent findings.

[1] Professor of Poltical Science and Law, University of California, Berkeley. This paper on draws on research reported in Robert A. Kagan, Adversarial Legalism: The American Way of Law (Harvard University Press, 2001) and Robert A. Kagan & Lee Axelrad, eds., Regulatory Encounters: Multinational Corporations and American Adversarial Legalism (University of California, Press, 2000). References supporting the material in this paper can be found in those works.

I. American Legal Distinctiveness: Adversarial Legalism

One recurrent finding concerns the substantive similarity of laws in wealthy democracies. For example, the basic national norms for many areas of regulation – environmental protection, product safety, workplace safety & health, civil rights, consumer protection -- tend to be surprisingly similar. That is, in the U.S. and other economically advanced democracies basically regulate the same air and water pollutants, establishing similar maximum emission levels, or similar "best available control technologies. Product liability standards in the EU resemble those established by American courts. National rules and reserve requirements concerning bank safety and soundness are similar.

The second recurrent finding , however, is that in terms of the forms of law and modes of implementation and adjudication, the United States employs a unique legal or regulatory style. Repeatedly, comparative studies find that the relevant American legal or regulatory process, compared to foreign counterpart, has eight distinctive features:

(1) more complex and detailed bodies of rules;

(2) more frequent recourse to formal legal methods of implementing policy and resolving disputes;

(3) more adversarial and expensive forms of legal contestation;

(4) more punitive legal sanctions (including larger civil damage awards);

(5) more frequent judicial review, revision, and delay of administrative decision-making; and

(6) more legal uncertainty, malleability, and unpredictability.

(7) more political controversy about legal rules and institutions and processes

(8) More legal uncertainty and instability

Adversarial legalism is my term that I have used to summarize those features of the American legal and regulatory style.

II. The "Regulatory Encounters" Project: Greater Legal Uncertainty in the U.S

In latter half of 1990s, I organized my own comparative study, entailing ten case studies, each of which examined a specific multinational corporation that conducts parallel business operation in the United States and in at least one other rich democracy and was subject to similar legal or regulatory regime in each country. One case study, for example, focused on a large e.g. motor vehicle manufacturer, and its application for an air pollution permit when it sought to expand two plants in the U.S. and two Germany. Another examined a chemical company's experience in seeking and defending a patent for the same new process in the U.S., Japan and the EU. Third concerned a large pharmaceutical company's legal obligations in assessing environmental damage and cleaning up similarly-contaminated industrial sites in the US, Great Britain, and The Netherlands. Put another way, in this project, which resulted in the book Regulatory Encounters,my fellow researchers and I used each multinational corporation as an observation post for viewing the legal characteristics of the different national regimes. The findings can be summarized as follows:

1. Compared to legal and regulatory regimes in Germany, Japan, Netherland, and Great Britain, American legal and regulatory rules and processes usually were not experienced as significantly more stringent.

2. But the American legal rules were experienced as more prescriptive and detailed; yet

3. American legal and regulatory regimes were experienced as more legally unpredictable, confusing. That is, they generated more legal uncertainty for the enterprises subject to those regimes. The reasons arose from the following two findings.

4. The American legal and regulatory regimes generally were experienced to be more organizationally complex, more inconsistent, , and changeable. Enterprises had to deal with different bodies of legal and regulatory rules from state and federal governments, which often had different partisan-political leanings, and which often amended rules and policies following elections that resulted in partisan change. In addition, enterprises confronted often- unclear legal risks embodied in liability law, which also was experienced as more complex and changeable than laws it had to deal with in other countries.

5. American regulatory officials were experienced as more defensive and legalistic than their counterparts in other countries, more reluctant to work things out informally, more reluctant to make judgments without demanding more information, more tests, more certifications.

6. Regulatory and legal enforcement in the United States usually were experienced as more legalistic and punitive. Civil case damages and regulatory penalties both are much larger in the U.S. than elsewhere, and more readily invoked. The combination of greater legal uncertainty and much more severe legal penalties made American legal and regulatory regimes more threatening.

7. The regulatory and legal regimes in the United States generally were much more costly to comply with. (I will elaborate on this point below).

8. Similar outcomes. Despite the greater detail and punitiveness of American law, the multinational corporations in our case studies generally did not provide demonstrably higher levels of protection for customers, workers, or neighbors than they did in their operations in other rich democracies, where regulators employed less legalistic and adversarial methods.

III. The Costs of American Legal Uncertainty for Multinational Corporations

Let me elaborate on the "extra" costs attributable to American adversarial legalism that emerged from the comparisons with the companies' experience in other wealthy democracies. These extra costs were of three kinds: (a) much larger direct expenditures on lawyers and legal processes ; (b) much larger "accountability costs," by which I mean the costs of determining one's legal obligations and proving that one has complied with them (including expenditures on consultants, studies, reporting, paperwork); and (c) greater opportunity costs, stemming from longer legal and regulatory delays.

a. Legal Services. Officials in multinational enterprises often mentioned that their company spends far more money on legal services in its American operations than in its parallel operations in other countries, put together. American subsidiaries consult lawyers more often and longer on a wider range of matters, ranging from selecting pollution control equipment to managing problem personnel and conducting sales transactions. They do so, project researchers repeatedly were told, because (1) American law is generally more complex, changeable, and difficult to master, and (2) the legal sanctions for being wrong are generally much higher.

For example, one case study involved a multinational pharmaceutical company that sought to implement identical personnel policies in all its branches and subsidiaries. Yet when it decided to terminate individual employees in the U.S., it consulted its attorneys earlier, more frequently, and in more depth than when terminating employees in Canada. That is because in one recent year in which the company's experience was studied in depth, almost 23 percent of "forced separations" of employees in the United States resulted in a lawsuit against the company, compared to 7 percent of forced separations in Canada - even though Canadian substantive law protecting employees against arbitrary dismissal is more comprehensive than is American law.

A company we called "Credit Corp" is a multinational bank, with credit card divisions in the U.S. and Germany. But in contrast to Credit Corp's American operations, the German division does not have to maintain separate in-house counsel's offices to deal with litigation management, consumer bankruptcy, and debtors' counterclaims. And unlike its U.S. counterpart, the German division does not feel obliged to provide ongoing, intensive legal training for collection agents. The reason lies in the greater complexity of American debtor protection laws and the much greater complexity and delay associated with pursuing debt collection cases in American courts, as compared to German courts.

A corporate general counsel in the U.S. office of a multinational chemical firm told us that in the company's U.S. subsidiary -- in contrast to its European corporate parent -- a wide variety of documents are routinely reviewed by the legal department. One stimulus to this procedure was a lawsuit for breach of contract in which a drawing made by a company sales representative was held, much to the company's surprise, to have been evidence of a contract. The suit cost the company roughly $500,000 in damages and $500,000 in disputing and lawyering costs. Now, the lawyer said, "Half of our salesmen are scared to death to do anything without consulting a lawyer." The U.S. subsidiary employs six specially-trained nonlawyers who spend at least half their time fielding legal questions that salespeople routinely ask about sales contracts. To further avoid legal problems, the corporate attorney added, "When European people [from the parent firm] come over here, we have to forbid them from talking or writing letters to anyone."

Most shockingly, Welles and Engel found that Waste Corp (Chapter 5) spent a staggering $15 million on legal services in the course of its efforts to obtain approval for a municipal solid waste landfill in California; for over ten years, the company had approximately seven lawyers on retainer, busy addressing, inter alia, two major administrative appeals and three extended lawsuits. .... In England, by contrast, the company retained two lawyers, part-time, for an eight year process that also included at least one administrative appeal; its legal costs there were about $137,000. And in The Netherlands, despite having undergone two administrative appeals, the company didn't have to retain lawyers at all (since lawyers are not required in administrative appeals) and spent "less than $50,000" on legal services.

b. Accountability Costs. The cross-national differences in accountability costs are symbolized most strikingly by the huge volume of supporting evidence companies must supply to regulators in the U.S. in order to demonstrate that the firm has met legal standards. Consider the experience of "D Corp" when it notified regulatory authorities in the U.S., England, and The Netherlands that it had discovered solvents which had leaked from deteriorating underground tanks and pipes. In each jurisdiction, D Corp embarked on discussions with regulators concerning further soil and groundwater testing and remediation. The American regulators, however, demanded far more comprehensive analysis, more voluminous documentation, and more costly reports.

D Corp corporate regulatory compliance group officials said that documents submitted to American regulators for such contaminated sites typically fill a four-drawer filing cabinet, compared to a foot of depth in a single file drawer to the other countries. And behind each additional 10 pages of documentation, they emphasized, lie scores of hours which company officers must devote to research, testing, measurement, analysis, and preparation and checking of draft reports. All in all, D Corp officials estimated that "extra" studies, submissions and negotiations with U.S. regulators added $8 to $10 million to the costs of designing the cleanup plan for the two sites in the U.S. (out of total costs per site of an estimated $22 million), whereas the "extra" regulatory accountability costs for comparable site investigations and cleanup planning in the U.K. and The Netherlands were negligible.

As of the time of our study, remediation efforts in England and The Netherlands were well under way. But in the American sites, action remained on hold while the firm waited to learn if officials considered the company's analysis sufficient. In this case, therefore, the additional demands of the U.S. regulatory regime confirmed the maxim that when pushed too far, accountability (proving one has done the right thing) can displace responsibility (doing the right thing).

c. Opportunity Costs. According to an environmental consultant with a great deal of cross-national experience, because the regulatory permitting process for an industrial project in the U.S. entails a great deal more legal formality, organizational complexity, and documentation than in Western Europe, "It takes less time overseas. The cost for initial studies is less. We are not required to accumulate as much information. In Europe [the time from application to permit averages] one third less."

Consider, for example, the study in Regulatory Encounters of the U.S. and the German permit system for ensuring that changes in motor vehicle factory production and painting processes do not result in increased air pollution or obnoxious odors. Regulatory officials in both countries required Ford Motor Corporation to install similar pollution control technologies and to build higher exhaust stacks to diffuse odors. But for two factories in Western Germany, the time from permit application to approval took 5 months and 17 months, respectively; for Ford's plants in Minnesota and New Jersey alike, it took over four years.

IV. Legal Uncertainty and the American Tort System

In direct regulation by government agencies in the U.S. , the primary risk to liberty arises from the characteristic overinclusiveness of prescriptive, prophylactic regulatory rules – that is, rules that require specific precautionary actions by all regulated entities, even if the risk of harm in a particular case is remote.

Tort law seems to differ in that it is invoked only when harm has actually occurred. But tort law doesn't prescribe specific precautionary measures. It simply says, 'be careful?" Or "be really careful, or else!". But that, at least in the U.S., poses a risk to liberty because of (a) the uncertainty of what behavior will result in liability, (b) the fear that being wrong will result in a very expensive litigation process and potentially enormous money damages. Legal uncertainty + fearsomeness = defensive medicine in many kinds of activities.

This becomes even more clear when one looks at the American tort system in comparative perspective. For example, here's a passage from my book Adversarial Legalism (pp. 126-28) that summarizes a comparative study by sociolegal researchers from the Netherlands:

> In the 1970s and 1980s, the rate of asbestos-related diseases among Dutch workers was five to ten times as high as in the United States. Dutch law authorizes tort claims against employers. [But] as of 1991, [when] ... 200,000 asbestos-based tort cases had been filed in the U.S (and Johns Mansville had already been driven to bankruptcy), fewer than ten suits had been filed in The Netherlands. The primary reason ... [is that under Dutch social insurance programs] disabled Dutch workers are entitled to all needed medical care and lifelong benefits equal to 70 or 80 percent of their lost earnings, without having to prove an employer or product manufacturer did anything wrong.

So as in most other countries, there is much less incentive in the Netherlands to bring tort cases, and much more legal certainty for both for injured persons and defendants. Tort damages are much lower, first of all, because the Dutch tort victim, who gets medical care and earnings replacement from social insurance, basically can sue only for non-economic damages.

Secondly, the Netherlands, like most other democracies, deal with non-economic damages (what we call damages for "pain and suffering" and the like) very differently. Those damages are decided by a judge, according to specific rules, and they are more moderate than damages in US tort law – sort of like American worker compensation systems. As a result, the outcomes are so predictable that injured people often don't need to hire (and share their recovery with) a lawyer.

Contrast that with American tort law, where the calculation of non-economic damages is left to the discretion of a jury, which doesn't know about comparable decisions in other cases, and doesn't have to articulate and defend the reasons for its verdict, and whose decisions are by and large unreviewable. So noneconomic damages in the U.S. tend to be several times higher than actual out of pocket damages. And that creates much greater incentives to sue. [So while the substantive norms of product liability and medical malpractice are similar in the US and Europe, the rates of such litigation are enormously greater in America.

Because of the vagueness of the American law of damages and use of juries, damage awards for similar cases in the American tort law system are quite variable and harder to predict. Because the lawyer-driven, jury-trial oriented American litigation process is so much more expensive, and threatening than civil litigation in Western Europe, over 90 percent of cases are settled before verdict – which makes it even harder to predict what outcomes will be. Research shows that lawyers' estimates are often wrong. And research shows that businessmen, physicians, and other potential defendants vastly overestimate the likelihood of being sued, the likelihood of losing, and the severity of average jury verdicts.

Sociolegal research also indicates that American adversarial legalism is a truly terrible method for compensating victims of personal injuries or illnesses and their families. Its very inefficient, incomplete, erratic, and often unjust, as compared to systems that rely more on social insurance or well-run court systems organized in accordance with bureaucratic legalism.

What About Deterrence? Would substituting social insurance for tort liability make our society more dangerous? The other thing tort law is supposed to be good for, despite its weaknesses as a system for compensating injuries, is deterrence. The threat of liability presumably has regulatory effects – some defensive medicine is good. The threat of tort liability presumably makes corporations more careful in testing and designing products, and in maintaining machinery and sanitary standards, and in warning consumers about risks.

On June 14, a Wall St Journal article spelled how American anesthesiologists, in response to rising malpractice premiums, have adopted and disseminated innovative precautions that have resulted in a huge decline in patient deaths due to anesthesia.[2]

Political scientist Charles Epp interviewed a sample of city managers in the Midwest about tort liability. They complained about the resources their municipal [2] Over the past two decades, patient deaths due to anesthesia have declined to one death per 200,000 to 300,000 cases from one for every 5,000 cases, according to studies compiled by the Institute of Medicine, an arm of the National Academies, a leading scientific advisory body.

---

Malpractice payments involving the nation's 30,000 anesthesiologists are down, too, and anesthesiologists typically pay some of the smallest malpractice premiums around governments had to devote to defense of civil lawsuits, but they acknowledged that to ward off liability, their cities engaged in more systematic checks of road conditions and playground equipment, instituted more training for police and other employees who deal with the public, and acted more rapidly to weed out "problem officers." One of them said:

> The biggest changes for the better in this city have come as a result of lawsuits or threatened lawsuits, not as a result of political changes in the council or anything else. The courts have done a far better job than politics of improving our policies.

Another said:

> The rights of citizens and employees are far better protected as a result--and only as result of litigation, not other changes. And the safety of our citizens in better protected. Remember all that training and inspection I mentioned? It makes a difference. Our roads and streets are safer, our playgrounds are safer, our whole operation is safer.

On the other hand, the evidence on how pervasive these positive regulatory effects are is extremely incomplete. There are lots of ways in which the deterrence effects in practice are muted – especially by liability insurance and the uncertainty and delayed effect of tort liability. And we don't know how much the threat of tort liability adds to the pressures for responsible behavior that come from direct governmental regulation and market forces and professional ethics.

It surely is not clear that the level of negligence or heedlessness in providing goods and services is greater in Canada and Western Europe, where the threat of tort liability is vastly lower, than it is in the US. The issue (AL p.144) is whether tort law's positive effects on safety are too mixed, uncertain, and scattered to justify retention of an adversarial system that fails to provide just and reliable compensation, generates large economic costs, alienates people from the legal system, spends huge amounts on lawyers, and in some sectors of society, as Philip Howard's paper will show, inhibits socially useful activity.

THE ADMINISTRATIVE ADVANTAGE IN CIVIL PROCEDURE: TORT REFORM THROUGH CONSISTENT AND INTELLIGENT POLICIES APPLIED BY ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNALS

--- Substantive law is "secreted in the interstices of procedure"[2]

Most of the energy that has gone into "tort reform" in the United States to date has been misdirected. The features that create frivolous, abusive litigation in the U.S. are largely institutional and procedural in nature.[3] They inhere in the incentives created by our judicial institutions and procedures, and yet most of the energy of reformers to date has gone into modest reforms in substantive tort law – such as caps on punitive damages or on pain and suffering. These reforms may be symbolically satisfying to their proponents, but they leave untouched the basic institutions of our civil justice system and the perverse incentives that they create. Indeed, this misguided focus on changing substantive law is arguably even built into the generally-accepted term "tort reform," which seems to presume that the basic institutional and procedural structure of tort litigation should remain unchanged and that a few reforms of substantive tort law will be sufficient to deal with any problems.

One notable exception is the work of Professor John Langbein. In 1985, Professor Langbein wrote a much-cited article called "The German Advantage in Civil Procedure."[4] Langbein reviewed several salient aspect of German civil procedure including professional judges, the absence of juries and contingent fees, and greater use of independent experts and concluded that these procedural "advantages" contributed to the German system of civil litigation functioning better than the U.S. civil litigation system.

In the twenty years since Langbein wrote, however, there have been only a few modest efforts to address any of the underlying procedural and institutional aspects of U.S. civil litigation that he identified.[5] Ironically, our constitutional law and legal traditions, which are sometimes instruments of change in other areas, are one of the key impediments to modernizing the institutional and procedural aspects of our civil litigation system. Constitutional law as well as the even broader "unwritten constitution" of our legal traditions make it difficult to adopt innovations for processing damage claims that have proven successful elsewhere. Many of the problematic features of adversary civil litigation before courts and juries are so deeply ingrained into our constitutional law and legal traditions that it would be virtually impossible to change them. While the issue of whether constitutional law should "change with the times" is increasingly controversial in every area, the constitutional law relating to civil procedure is remarkably backward-looking and static. The avowed purpose of the 7th Amendment, for example, is to "preserve" unchanged the functions of the civil jury as they existed at common law as understood in 1791. More generally, when an innovation in civil litigation is challenged on procedural due process grounds, courts generally look backward to our history and traditions to determine whether it is constitutional. And even if a reform to the civil litigation system might conceivably be upheld in court against a formal constitutional challenge, there is an even broader "unwritten constitution" of political support that renders it virtually impossible to conceive of any legislature making material changes to the way that civil litigation is traditionally conducted before courts and juries.[6] Even relatively recent innovations such as broad civil discovery have proved very difficult to curtail once implemented.

There is, however, an alternative route by which American law could conceivably address some of more problematic aspects of the ways that we currently do civil litigation. That is through the legal fiction that "administrative tribunals" are not "courts."[7] Throughout our history, one of the main reasons for replacing traditional adversary civil litigation before courts and juries with administrative remedies before non-court courts (a.k.a. "quasi-judicial" administrative tribunals) is an enhanced ability by lawmakers to re-design the institutional and procedural features of the tribunals that apply the law as well as to change substantive law. One useful definition of an "administrative agency" is an institution of government that is not a court or legislature but is created and designed by statute.[8] Whereas the institutional aspects of "courts" are relatively fixed by constitutional law and tradition, administrative tribunals are by definition plastic and capable of being designed in many different forms. Administrative agencies are not one thing, but come in a dizzying variety of shape and sizes, with different institutional arrangements and procedures designed by statute or regulation to fit the particular task at hand. Indeed, the key defining feature of administrative institutions is that they are not "courts," and therefore their features can be custom-designed in ways that are not permissible for courts. Virtually every procedural innovation identified by Langbein, including professional judges, the elimination of juries and the enhanced role for independent expertise, currently exists in America, but in litigation before "administrative tribunals" rather than before "courts."

[6] See, e.g. Peter Schuck, How to Respond to the Problems of the Civil Jury, 77 JUDICATURE 236, 239 (1994)("The politics of jury reform are daunting. Virtually all of the important groups with stakes in the system of civil litigation favor retaining the jury. Trial lawyers' veneration of the jury is almost religious in its fervor, and their missionary zeal appears to have won many converts among the general public. When queried about the value of the jury, judges almost invariably praise it.")

As a consequence, a major trend in U.S. civil law during the 20th century has been, and will continue to be, the removal of certain subject matter areas of law in which institutional features of litigation before traditional courts have proved particularly troublesome from the traditional litigation system and the substitution of alternative remedies before administrative tribunals in their place. This long-term trend to substitute administrative remedies for common law litigation has occurred in the past with regulation of workplace safety, labor relations, securities regulation and environmental pollution, and is likely to occur next with exposure to toxic substances such as asbestos, and then in medical malpractice and product liability. Medical malpractice, product liability and mass toxic tort litigation are particularly good candidates for "The Administrative Advantage in Civil Procedure" because defining a consistent and intelligent standard of care is particularly important in these fields. Administrative law offers particular advantages when implementing a consistent standard of care across a large number of claims is important, and administrative bodies are also particularly good at up-dating a technical standard of care based on expertise and experience – or what I call an "intelligent" standard of care, because it learns over time.

It is impossible in a short article to discuss all of the institutional and procedural features of U.S. civil litigation that might be improved in administrative forums. In what follows I will therefore attempt to illustrate "The Administrative Advantage in Civil Procedure" with one specific illustration: the claim by some reformers, including Phillip Howard, that verdicts by civil juries are unpredictable and inconsistent. In what follows, I will briefly outline the claim that civil jury verdicts with regard to the standard of care in medical malpractice cases are unpredictable and inconsistent, and then explain why this tendency is difficult to correct in the context of ordinary civil litigation before courts but much easier to address before administrative tribunals. Examples of such administrative tribunals would include the administrative "health courts" proposed by Common Good for medical malpractice reform[9] or the administrative compensation system for asbestos

[9] For more details, see Common Good, An Urgent Call for Special Health Courts, http://cgood.org/brochure-hcare-4.html

The essence of the Common Good proposal is as follows: "Health courts would have judges dedicated full-time to resolving healthcare disputes. The judges would make written rulings in every case to provide guidance on proper standards of care. Their rulings would set precedents on which both patients and doctors could rely. As with similar administrative courts that exist in other areas of law—for tax proposed in S.852 (the so-called FAIR Act), which recently was voted out of committee in the Senate.[10]

The purpose of this paper is not to defend the specifics of these reform proposals as either necessary or sufficient, a task that has been performed elsewhere by others.[11] (It should be acknowledged, however, that the author was an early advocate of administrative compensation funds like the asbestos proposal[12] and serves as a consultant to Common Good.) Rather, the point of the present paper is that most if not all of the disputes, workers' compensation, and vaccine liability, among others—there would be no juries. To assure uniformity and predictability, each ruling could be appealed to a new Medical Appellate Court." Ibid.

Other features of the Common Good proposal are:

"Full-Time Judges.
The hallmark of the health courts would be full-time judges, dedicated solely to addressing healthcare cases. The judges would be appointed through a nonpartisan screening commission.
Neutral Experts.
Those judges would be able to choose from a panel of experts in each area of medicine, avoiding the dueling "hired gun" experts that confuse and prolong disputes today.
Speedy Proceedings; Lower Costs.
Most cases would be resolved within months. Except in exceptional cases, legal fees would be held to 20 percent, reducing current costs by almost half.
Liberalized Recovery for Injured Patients.
Once a mistake is verified, recovery would be automatic without the need to prove precisely how it happened.
Damages.
Patients would be reimbursed for all of their medical costs and lost income, plus a fixed sum that would be pre-determined according to a schedule addressing specific types of injuries. The schedule would be established by a panel of experts and updated periodically to reflect changing costs."

[10] The text of the FAIR Act as reported out by the Senate Judiciary Committee is available at http://documents.nam.org/IS/S852asreportedfromcmte061705.pdf The bill is 393 pages in length, so it is impossible to summarize its provisions in detail here. For present purposes, one pertinent feature is that the bill would replace case-by-case litigation in asbestos cases with "tiers" developed by a combination of statute and administrative rulemaking for determining both compensation payments to claimants and payments by defendants into the system.

reforms in these proposals cannot be accomplished within the existing court-based litigation system, but can be implemented through administrative tribunals.

II.

In a 2003 op-ed in The New York Times, Phillip K. Howard succinctly stated the case that existing court procedures in medical malpractice cases create a highly undesirable element of unpredictability.[13] Howard argues that "Studies about jury awards in health care confirm what every doctor fears – and every victim should fear: justice is random."[14] He goes on to argue that "in a civil case, where citizens can use the justice system as an offensive weapon, the most important social value is predictability."[15] Howard's proposed solution (about which we will have more to say later) is that judges, not juries should decide the standard of care:

> "Creating a reliable system of medical justice, however, requires changing one aspect of the system that is so ingrained it is hardly even part of the debate: the jury. Expert judges, not juries, must decide what is a valid claim. ... The role of juries in civil cases is to decide disputed facts, like whether someone is telling the truth. It is not to declare standards of care that affect society as a whole."[16]

Proponents of asbestos reform make similar claims: that verdicts in asbestos cases are inherently capricious, and as a result, some people who are not really sick get huge windfalls, while others who are much sicker get little or nothing.[17] One of the major justifications advanced for the pending bills to replace traditional tort litigation in asbestos cases with an administrative compensation system is that it would give greater predictability and horizontal fairness to both claimants and defendants than the current system of case-by-case litigation.

Speaking more generally, Yale Law School Professor Peter H. Schuck has identified as one of the recurrent "major objections" to the civil jury to be the contention that jury verdicts are inherently unpredictable and produce a "noisy" or unclear liability signal:

> "These objections do not claim that juries are biased or prone to error, but rather than jury decisions by their very nature emit liability signals that are confusing, inconsistent, and arbitrary. In this view, the jury's signals convey little useful information about actual legal norms. Coupled with the largely unregulated, generous system of damage awards, jury decisions generate widespread uncertainty, anxiety, and risk avoidance."[18]

Defenders of the civil jury do not generally deny that juries "march to a different drummer," but argue instead that juries are able to reflect a number of situational and community norms that are not always fully captured in the formal law. For example, in a 1988 article, Professor E. Donald Elliott stated that toxic tort cases are "morality plays" rather than based on a strict application of law and science.[19] While this statement was intended as descriptive rather than normative or prescriptive, it has been strongly criticized as countenancing the right of juries to decide toxic tort cases based on factors the very substantial factor when a claimant gives up a constitutional right to jury trial, but in a program structured largely along lines of workmen's compensation, it is our conclusion that it is a fair exchange. When you find that there are many people who are suffering deadly ailments from asbestos , mesothelioma and other deadly injuries, who are not being compensated, this is a way to compensate those individuals whose companies have gone bankrupt.").

that would be considered irrelevant as a matter of formal law.[20] Similarly, then-professor, now-judge Guido Calabresi and his co-author, Professor Phillip Bobbitt, glory in the ability of a civil jury, which they call an "aresponsible agency," to decide cases without giving any reasons for its decision, particularly in certain categories of cases involving what they call "tragic choices" in which they believe that it is desirable for society to violate in practice the norms that it nonetheless affirms in theory.[21]

III.

In contrast to the civil jury, which is either praised or condemned for its inconsistency, inscrutability and unpredictability, consistency of application and transparency in giving reasons for outcomes are two of the most highly-valued norms for administrative tribunals. As Justice Scalia recently wrote for a unanimous Supreme Court, "It is hard to imagine a more violent breach of [the requirement of reasoned decision-making by administrative tribunals] than applying a rule of primary conduct ... which is in fact different than the rule or standard formally announced."[22] Indeed, a central focus of judicial review of decisions by administrative tribunals is to police against "arbitrary and capricious" decisions that do not treat like cases alike or are not adequately justified.[23] Administrative tribunals must generally follow strict rules requiring them to state reasons for their decisions, and if they apply a different rule of decision in one case that they do in another, they must state a rational basis for the difference in treatment or provide a reasoned basis for changing the rule that will be applied in future cases.[24] In administrative law, "There may not be a rule for Monday, another for Tuesday, a rule for general application, but denied outright in a specific case."[25]

Administrative law also provides a useful conceptual resource for dealing with standard of care issues that is generally lacking in civil litigation: the concept of a generic "policy." Court generally deploy only two conceptual categories to describe the allocation of roles between judges and juries: questions of "law," and questions of "fact." Everything has to be one or the other. But before an administrative tribunal, there is an important third category: called "policy."[26] A "policy" is not a fixed requirement established by law, nor is it a "fact" that may change from case to case; rather, a "policy" is a contingent or prudential judgment that must be applied consistently while it remains in effect but may be changed from time to time in the light of experience. The standard of care in a medical malpractice case, or the showing required to qualify for compensating persons exposed to asbestos, are good examples of "policies," that are neither purely matters of law nor purely matters of fact.

Administrative agencies make policy in a variety of ways, including generic notice-and-comment rules, guidance documents and announcing rules of decision through case-by-case litigation.[27] However, the strong trend in administrative law since the early 1970's is to constrain case-by-case litigation of "facts" by developing generic "policies" through rulemaking that reflect the agency's general expertise as to how individual cases should be treated. The intellectual leader in promoting the use of rulemaking to reduce arbitrariness and promote consistency was Professor Kenneth Culp Davis, who spent most of his career at the University of Chicago Law School.[28] Uniform generic policies are then applied in individual cases, but can change and evolve in the light of experience. A good example is the Social Security medical disability grid regulations that were upheld by a unanimous Supreme Court in Heckler v. Campbell, 461 U.S. 458 (1983). Confronted with an unacceptable diversity of results in similar cases, the Reagan Administration first attempted to achieve a greater uniformity through management controls and a "Quality Assurance Program," but this approach was challenged in court as infringing on the independence of Administrative Law Judges, who varied widely in how they decided cases.[29] That approach having proven inadequate, the Administration then promulgated a generic rule setting specific, relatively objective criteria for when a person is or is not considered "disabled."

In 1999, the Social Security disability system provided $51 billion in payments to 6.5 million beneficiaries at an administrative cost of $1.5 billion, or about 3%,[30] which compares very favorably with the transaction costs of the torts system which run as high as 50% in some studies. The system generates about 600,000 disputed claims a year, and 200,000 appeals to the Appeals Council. "The volume of Appeals Council decisions precludes the development of any "common law" of administrative review; rather, if the review process uncovers needs for new policy or clarification, that policy or clarification is supplied by regulation or similar directives to all decisionmakers in the system."[31] Thus, policy decisions across the system are supplied not by a common law process of deciding appeals, but by relatively specific generic rules of policy that are developed by experts and apply across the system until updated in the light of experience.

Many other administrative systems also use a process of generic rulemaking based on expert policy decisions to guide and constrain the issues to be decided in individual adjudicatory hearings. For example, at one time, the Food and Drug Administration decided on a case by case basis in adjudicatory hearings on individual new drug application whether the particular scientific studies presented were adequate to prove safety and efficacy, and those judgments were both time-consuming and frequently litigated. Beginning in the late 1960's, however, FDA promulgated generic policy standards for what constitutes "well-controlled clinical studies" and in a precedent-setting decision in 1973, the Supreme Court ruled that generic policymaking by the agency could constrain the issues in individual adjudicatory hearings.[32] Or to pick another example, when the Environmental Protection Agency holds hearings on cleaning up an individual

Superfund site, the assessment of risks by the decisionmaker is guided and constrained by a detailed generic rule called the "National Contingency Plan" which outlines EPA's policies and procedures for how a site should be cleaned up.[33]

Questions of standard of care that are currently decided by a case by case basis by juries in the tort system could be regulated and made more uniform by generic policies promulgated at the administrative level and updated from time to time in the light of experience.[34] In fact, the pending asbestos trust legislation would utilize administrative rulemaking to determine the levels of contributions by defendants into the system, and also to set criteria to determine levels of payouts, within broad ranges set by the legislature,.

Generic policy judgments are not only applied relatively consistently by administrative agencies, but they can also be designed to be intelligent, in the sense that procedures can be designed to bring technical expertise to bear, to analyze collateral consequences and to update policies in the light of experience. These complex multi-faceted technical issues of regulatory policy are currently made in a haphazard, uncoordinated and inept fashion in the distorting context of individual claims by injured people by lay juries that do not understand (and often prohibited from even hearing evidence about) the broader implications of their decisions. That is because these issues are incorrectly conceived to be "questions of fact," when in truth they are neither questions of law for a judge nor questions of fact for a jury, but rather they are questions of regulatory policy (a conceptual category that is sadly missing from traditional judicial thinking about tort law, but is alive and well in administrative law). As policy questions, they should be made in a more centralized way by more specialized institutions that can weigh the pro's and con's of proposed policy decisions in a more systematic way after due deliberation and consideration of relevant technical expertise (such as costs and benefits, substitution risks and incentive effects). Moreover, institutions making important decisions of regulatory and compensation policy should be designed to study the actual results of particular policies over time and to change them in the light of experience.[35] The current tort system of case-by-case litigation before lay judges and juries has none of these features, in large part because it is incapable of separating the regulatory policy decisions from the compensation decisions in cases brought by individual claimants who are often suffering and are therefore sympathetic.[36]

IV.

It would be difficult, if not impossible, for Constitutional reasons to bring greater predictability to jury verdicts involving the standard of care. Unlike administrative law, which uses three conceptual categories (law, fact and policy), the 7th Amendment has been construed as creating only two realms, "law" and "fact," and traditionally questions of the standard of care have been seen as falling on the "fact" side of the line.

The fundamental purpose of the 7th Amendment, according to an unbroken line of

Supreme Court cases, is to preserve inviolate the allocation of issues of "law" to the judge and of "fact" to the jury as those concepts existed and were applied in 1791. The 7th Amendment has for its primary purposes the preservation of "the common law distinction between the province of the court and that of the jury, whereby, in the absence of express or implied consent to the contrary, issues of law are resolved by the court and issues of fact are to be determined by the jury under appropriate instructions by the court." [37]

The question of whether the meaning of our Constitution should evolve and change with the times is, of course, one of the central, enduring controversies in Constitutional law and judicial philosophy. Almost uniquely, however, the specific content of established 7th Amendment law is to "preserve," unchanged and unchanging, the allocation of responsibilities between judge and jury as they existed in 1791. In other words, the content of the rule of decision that the Supreme Court has traditionally applied in construing the 7th Amendment is explicitly historical: how were these allocations of responsibility made in 1791? "Those matters which were tried to a jury in England in 1791 are to be so tried today and those matters which, as in equity, were tried to a judge in England in 1791 are to be so tried today...."[38]

It is well-established under a long line of Supreme Court's cases under the Jones Act and elsewhere that under the 7th Amendment, the issue of the reasonableness of conduct is considered an issue of "fact" that (1) is constitutionally required to be decided by a jury and (2) cannot be re-examined by a judge or appellate court – provided of course that there is at least some minimal evidence upon which a jury could reasonably base a finding of liability. A good example is International Co. v. Nederl. Amerik, 393 U.S. 74 (1968), a unanimous per curiam decision of the Supreme Court. In that case, the evidence showed that a longshoreman had remained below decks where carbon monoxide was building up because a supervisor had promised to turn on the ship's ventilating system. As explained by the Supreme Court, "The Court of Appeals said that the hatch boss should have ceased work when he first learned that the ship's ventilating system was not operating, despite the officer's promise to turn on the system. Alternatively, he should have used the stevedore's blowers, which had been left on the pier, to ventilate the hold. The jury, however, in response to a special interrogatory, found that the stevedore had acted reasonably in continuing to work for a brief period in reliance on the officer's promise. We cannot agree with the Court of Appeals that the stevedore acted unreasonably as a matter of law. Under the Seventh Amendment, that issue should have been left to the jury's determination."[39]

One can of course distinguish the level of precaution taken against carbon monoxide poisoning on a ship from the level of care that a surgeon uses in conducting an operation, or a physician uses in prescribing a drug with known side effects, but the courts have generally held that the question of whether particular conduct is reasonable under all the circumstances is prototypically a question of fact for the jury, not a question of law for the court.

To be sure, judges could conceivably become more aggressive in granting directed verdicts or judgments n.o.v. on the grounds that the facts would not permit a reasonable jury to find the defendant liable, but this is likely to be of only marginal benefit in improving the consistency of jury verdicts. In the first place, the capacity of non-specialized judges without medical training to second-guess juries on technical questions can easily be over-rated; without expert guidance, how is a lay judge to say that a jury verdict on standard of care is "unreasonable"? A more promising approach might be for the judge to rely on a neutral expert, or panels of neutral experts.[40] But while these approaches may be marginal improvements, they are inherently case-specific and ad hoc and therefore do not capture and build intelligence in the system over time in the way that development of administrative policy guidance does.

It is of course theoretically possible to imagine that any existing body of legal doctrine might be abandoned or re-worked by the Supreme Court. But absent an outright repeal of the language of the 7th Amendment, it seems exceedingly unlikely that the Court will abandon its historical approach to determining the allocation of responsibilities between judge and jury in civil case. The most promising development that might persuade the Supreme Court to re-think the role of the civil jury in determining the standard of care is historical research showing that in actuality, some standard of care issues were decided historically at common law by judges rather than juries. For example, the Court's "reasoning" in one of its most recent 7th Amendment cases consisted of the following: "After the adoption of the Seventh Amendment, federal courts followed this English common law in treating the civil penalty suit as a particular type of an action in debt, requiring a jury trial. See, e. g., United States v. Mundell, 27 F. Cas. 23 (No. 15,834) (CC Va. 1795)."[41] Absent new historical research, however, it seems unlikely that that Supreme Court will abandon its well-established and often-reiterated jurisprudence that standard of care issues are prototypical issues of "fact" for the jury, not issues of "law" for the judge.

The clear trend throughout the last half century has been to expand, rather than contract the role of the jury. For example, in 1970 when the Supreme Court was presented with the question of the role of juries in stockholders derivative actions, to which the closest historical analogy was a suit in equity in which no jury was required, the Court nonetheless held that a jury was required under the 7th Amendment if similar issues could have been raised in jury cases.[42] Moreover, in a series of cases, the Court held that the right to a jury trial cannot be abridged by trying factual issues first in an equitable proceeding and then using collateral estoppel to preclude re-litigation in a subsequent proceeding at law.[43] And in what is perhaps the most far-reaching precedent expanding the role of the common law jury, in 1974, the court held in Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. 189 (1974), that even new statutory causes of action that clearly did not exist in

1791 also required jury trials if the relief sought could be analogized to that available historically in common law causes of action.[44] This holding was followed again in Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412 (1987), although a ray of light may have emerged in that the Court held that a jury was required only for the liability phase of a Clean Water Act enforcement action, not to determine relief. The Supreme Court recently reiterated these principles again in Great-West Life & Annuity Insurance Co. v. Knudson, 534 U.S. 204 (2002), holding that a suit for money damages under ERISA is not equitable relief, but "at law," and therefore requires a jury. In short, the clear trend in 7th Amendment jurisprudence for the last century has not been to constrain but to expand the role of civil juries.

While it is true that the 7th Amendment is not "incorporated" as binding on the states through the 14th Amendment, nonetheless jury trials are guaranteed in similar if not identical terms in virtually all 50 state constitutions. There is no perceptible trend at the state level to re-allocate standard of care issues to judges rather than juries, and any movement to do so would confront similar problems at the level of state constitutional law.

It would require a major abandonment of the Supreme Court's 7th Amendment jurisprudence, and analogous bodies of law at the state level, to hold that questions of negligence or standard of care are questions of law for the court, rather than questions of fact for the jury.

One reason that American constitutional law has been able to permit itself the luxury of preserving "inviolate" the right to a civil jury as it existed in 1791 is that there is an escape valve by which Congress may re-assign many, if not most, controversies to a non-jury forum if it so chooses. As discussed above, a broad right to a civil jury trial attaches even to new statutory causes of action unknown at common law if, but only if, Congress chooses to create rights enforceable in a traditional court by a damage action (or other "legal" relief). But Congress also has the alternative option of creating new statutory schemes to replace traditional ones and making them enforceable through administrative tribunals that do not utilize juries instead of courts – at least if the nature of the right in question is deemed "public" rather than "private"[45] (a distinction of some complexity, which is discussed in more detail below).

A major trend in U.S. law over the last century is for many areas of law that were traditionally the province of common law courts and juries to be re-assigned to administrative mechanisms. For example, the Occupational Safety and Health Act now regulates issues of safety in the workplace that were formerly the subject of common law suits, and the Supreme Court has specifically upheld non-jury OSHA proceedings against a claim that they violate the 7th Amendment.[46] In the same way that in a previous generation, both state and federal governments replaced a system of private lawsuits in courts over workplace injuries with a comprehensive administrative schemes of workers compensation laws,[47] a comprehensive administrative scheme could be designed today for re-adjusting remedies for those suffering injuries during medical treatment, or from defective products or exposure to toxic substances such as asbestos, to replace litigation before traditional courts. For example, Common Good has proposed a system of administrative "health courts" at either the state or federal level.[48] While not entirely free from doubt, federal administrative tribunals to adjudicate medical malpractice cases would probably be constitutional (at least if one assumes that Congress has the right under the Commerce Clause to regulate medical malpractice litigation because its involves economic activity that is "in" and "affects" interstate commerce, an independent issue of some complexity which is outside the scope of this paper[49]).

Assuming that Congress has the power to regulate medical malpractice litigation under the Commerce Clause, Congress could probably replace litigation before traditional courts and lay juries with a comprehensive administrative system for dealing with medical injuries, including expert administrative tribunals without juries. It should be emphasized, however, that the result would be heavily dependent upon the specific provisions of a particular statutory scheme, including whether it was a comprehensive package of reforms of the medical care delivery safety system and whether it included [48] See supra note 9.

[49] The power of the federal government to legislate under the Commerce Clause on subjects such as medical malpractice is no longer as clear as it seemed only a few years ago. United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995); United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000). In Morrison, the Court invalidated a federal criminal statute punishing violence against women. Even though conceding that there was evidence that violence against women did have an effect on commerce, the Court nonetheless held that what it characterized as an "incidental effect" on commerce does not justify the federal government in regulating areas that have "traditionally" been regulated by the states. On the other hand, the recent "medical marijuana" case would seem to support federal legislation to regulate the safety of medical care, in part because it is economic activity. Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U. S. -- (No. 03–1454 June 6, 2005).

DOJ_NMG_0144025

benefits for injured parties as well as defendants.

There are two separate federal constitutional issues that would be raised by assigning malpractice claims to an administrative agency (or to a specialized Article I court, which would raise essentially the same constitutional issues): (1) an argument that the statute impermissibly assigns a "judicial" function to a tribunal that does not comply with Article III requirements, Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50 (1982), and (2) an argument that the administrative tribunals violate 7th Amendment rights to a jury trial. Atlas Roofing Co., Inc. v. OSHA, 430 U.S. (1977).

In the modern analysis, both questions turn on whether the Supreme Court would characterize the reforms as involving "public" or "private" rights. An early case, Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22 (1932), held that "private rights" "that is, of the liability of one individual to another under the law as defined" must be reserved to Article III courts. Although never over-ruled, subsequent cases have significantly eroded the bright-line, conceptual test for "private rights" seemingly laid down in Crowell. In the Supreme Court's most recent venture into the thicket of distinguishing "private" and "public" rights, the Court wrote:

> "whether the 7th Amendment confers .. a right to a jury trial in the face of Congress's decision to assign adjudication of that action to a non-Article III tribunal [turns on the public/private rights distinction]. Congress may only deny trials by jury in actions at law ... in cases where 'public rights' are litigated. ... [t]he federal Government need not be a party for a case to revolve around public rights. The crucial question ... is whether Congress ... has created a seemingly 'private' right that is so closely integrated into a public regulatory scheme as to be a matter appropriate for agency resolution with limited involvement by the Article III judiciary." Granfinanciera SA v. Paul C. Nordberg, Creditor Trustee, 492 U.S. 33 (1989)(emphasis supplied).

Another recent case opined that the issue is not so much whether the affected rights are conceptualized as "private" or "public," but rather whether the re-assignment of certain categories of cases to administrative tribunals would undermine the traditional role of the federal courts in our scheme of government.[50] It seems unlikely that many federal judges view hearing medical malpractice cases under their diversity jurisdiction as central to preserving the role of the federal courts in our constitutional order.

Perhaps the decision that is most analogous to medical malpractice is Thomas v. Union Carbide Agricultural Prod. Co., 473 U.S. 568 (1985). There as part of a comprehensive re-working of the federal pesticide law (FIFRA), Congress provided for "me too" registrations of pesticides based on private test data developed by other manufacturers and set up a scheme of compulsory arbitration by the EPA of the value of data. Union Carbide sued, claiming that its right to sue under state law for violations of its common law trade secrets was a prototypical "private right" that could not be re-assigned to an administrative scheme under Crowell. The Supreme Court rejected the claim in an opinion by Justice O'Connor (also the author of Schor, supra):

> "[T]he right created by FIFRA is not a purely 'private' right, but bears many of the characteristics of a 'public' right. Use of a registrant's data to support a follow-on registration serves a public purpose as in integral part of a program safeguarding public health. Congress has the power, under Article I, to authorize an agency administering a complex regulatory scheme to allocate costs and benefits among voluntary participants in the program without providing an Article III adjudication."

Like the state law claim for violation of trade secrets at issue in Thomas, medical malpractice claims should not be viewed in isolation, but rather as part of a comprehensive and intertwined system for funding medical care and regulating patient safety.

[50] Commodity Futures Trading Comm. v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833 (1986)("the congressional scheme does not impermissibly intrude on the province of the judiciary" because "limited CFTC jurisdiction over a narrow class of common law claims as an incident of CFTC's primary and unchallenged adjudicative function does not create a substantial threat to the separation of powers.")

To be sure, the examples of formerly-private common law rights that have re-assigned to administrative tribunals without juries in Schor and Thomas are much narrower than reform of medical malpractice law. Moreover, participation in both of the regulatory programs upheld in Schor and Thomas was arguably "voluntary." Certainly the case for the constitutionality of administrative "health courts" would be stronger if patients were given the option of opting into a voluntary pilot program which included an administrative system for processing medical injury claims as well as other features.

Many traditionalists will assert that tort claims for medical malpractice are prototypical "private rights" that have historically been assigned to courts and juries and cannot be changed under Crowell. However, a statutory scheme that creates federal administrative tribunals for adjudicating medical malpractice claims would be probably upheld if the administrative tribunals were part of a comprehensive regulatory scheme for reforming the medical care system, particularly if the system were limited at least initially to Medicare or Medicaid recipients where the federal interest in reform is strongest. The system would also be more likely to be upheld if it were part of a comprehensive package of reforms including other measures to improve the quality and safety of the medical care delivery system, such as enhanced disclosure, and "experienced-based" mechanisms to monitor and improve patient safety.

Similarly, while the constitutionality of substituting a federal trust fund administered in part through administrative rulemaking for case-by-case litigation of asbestos cases in state courts is also not entirely free from doubt, if the system is enacted, most of it will also probably be upheld.

It seems unlikely that today's Supreme Court believes that the "traditional role of the federal courts in our scheme of government" (to quote the test from Schor, supra) is to adjudicate private claims for damages between individuals. While these claims were admittedly once conceived as prototypical "private rights" to which Crowell applied and forever guaranteed a judicial forum, the public policy consequences are increasingly apparent to litigation which has a major effect of regulating important economic activity. The power of government to regulate has typically followed from the perception that an activity that was formerly thought of solely private has important externalities or public consequences.[51] Mass torts and medical malpractice litigation are no different, and ultimately Congress will not be found to lack power to address the problems of frivolous litigation any more than it has lacked the power to deal with other serious economic and social problems in the past.

VI.

It is regrettable that most American lawyers are either "court people" or 'agency people" but not both. The American "civil justice system" actually consists of both courts and administrative tribunals and it is important to bring both sets of tools to bear as we consider strategies for civil justice reform. This paper has argued that there are distinctive advantages to administrative as opposed to judicial tribunals for developing and applying consistent and intelligent standards of care.

How Did We Get Here? What Litigation Was, What It is Now, What It Might Be

By Stephen B. Presser[1]

Introduction: Law and Litigation on a Pernicious Precipice

In America, litigation is now a multi-billion dollar business.[2] This country has more lawyers as a percentage of the population than any other – a fact which is now notorious[3] – but less well understood is that our current civil justice system is not at all the way it used to be. We hardly blink at multi-billion dollar verdicts in class actions against corporations, and it is now common place for state attorneys general to seek million or billion dollar settlements against whole industries, an undertaking that New York Attorney General Spitzer, for example, has perfected to a high art. The suggestion that I will make here is that this is a departure from our heritage, and a marked change in

No other industrialized country reportedly pays more as a percentage of its Gross Domestic Product." (American Tort Reform Association's estimate, quoted on September 13, 2004). With the United States Population estimated at about 300, 000,000, this would work out to be 242.7 Billion dollars.

the perception of what civil justice was supposed to be all about. Our English common law heritage was that lawsuits were supposed to be about settling intractable disputes between private parties about private rights, but the lawsuit, and particularly the class action, has now become more of an effort for wholesale vindication of purported constitutional or statutory policies.[4]

Our boast used to be that ours was a government of laws not men,[5] but the prejudices of particular litigants, the cooperation of complacent judges, and the misunderstandings of regulators and legislators have undermined what we used to have. Instead of a government of laws designed to protect the property and civil rights of individual citizens we may now have institutionalized lawsuit oppression and redistribution through the civil justice system. Instead of a civil justice system concerned with the preservation of individual liberty, and, in particular the liberty of entrepreneurs who furthered the economic well-being of society, we now have a civil justice system in which entrepreneurial actors can never be certain that they can avoid ending up as defendants in unpredictable lawsuits.[6]

How we got to the pernicious precipice on which we now stand is not an easy

Rev. 1281, 1282,1284 (1976) (Contrasting the traditional view of lawsuits as settling private rights with the recent conception of lawsuits as policy-vindicating devices.) See also William Wiecek, The Lost World of Classical Legal Thought: Law and Ideology in America 1886-1937 8 (1998) ("In nineteenth-century law . . . the individual was the exclusive focus of concern in legal, moral, and political reasoning. Lawyers of the time did not think of society as a congeries of groups, which is the assumption of interest-group pluralism that dominates twentieth-century political analysis.")

[5] See, e.g. John Marshall's famous opinion in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 163 (1803) ("The government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of men. It will certainly cease to deserve this high appellation, if the laws furnish no remedy for the violation of a vested legal right.") thing to discern, as it happened slowly and almost imperceptively as a part of a broader cultural change. Having no monarchy, no aristocracy, and no established church, we Americans have had only our law to bind us together, and, from the beginning, as Toqueville famously observed, the law was a vulgar tongue in this country.[7] Legislation and enlightened judges were early relied on to transform our English common law heritage into a body of doctrines and rules suitable for a young republic,[8] and the constitutional system of checks and balances, federalism, and judicial review in particular were supposed to ensure that the work of legislatures and trial courts did not undermine the protection of life, liberty, and property for which our revolution was fought and our Constitution ratified.[9] It does not go too far to say that the American Revolution ought to be conceived of as Englishmen fighting Englishmen for the rights of Englishmen, for the preservation of the rule of law and the English Common Law's protection of individuals against arbitrary power. The post-revolutionary institutions, and, in particular the federal Constitution ratified in 1789 had as its aim the preservation of the rule of law in general, and of individual liberty and private ownership of property in particular.[10]

[6] On this lawsuit unpredictability, see, e.g. Philip Howard, The Death of Common Sense: How Law is Suffocating America (1996), and, on related developments in criminal law see, e.g. Gene Healy, ed., Go Directly to Jail: The Criminalization of Almost Everything (2004).

Somehow, however, in the second half of the Twentieth Century, these checks and balances, that system of federalism, and the institution of judicial review came loose from their original moorings. The federal government, which had been set up as a means of protecting the rights of Americans, began instead seriously to encroach on them. It had been the early theory of the framers that the state and local governments ought to be the primary regulators, since the notion was that the government closest to the people would be most responsive to it.[11] From the fourth decade of the twentieth century, however, the administrative agencies spawned in the New Deal, and the federal courts combined to set national policy in a manner that began more seriously to restrict what state and local governments could do, and which rendered private property and individual liberty more precarious.

Expansively interpreting the Fourteenth Amendment and the bill of Rights, the federal courts decided that state legislatures had failed substantially to deliver justice to all, and the federal legislature, federal agencies,[12] and the federal courts subsequently emerged as major policy-makers for the nation.[13] Simultaneously, a significant part of the [11] See, e.g. the Tenth Amendment, which provides that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," giving rise to the notion that the federal government is one of limited and enumerated powers, reserving the others to the state and local governments, those closest to the people. The idea that the government closest to the people was best appears to have been early associated with Jeffersonian Republicans, but most recently it has been embraced by the modern Republican party. See e.g. the remarks of Senator Fred Thompson, made on May 3, 1995:

> I would remind many of my Republican brethren that we ran for office and were elected last year on the basis of our strong belief that the government that is closest to the people is the best government; that Washington does not always know best; that more responsibility should be given to the States because that is where most of the creative ideas and innovations are happening. Whether it be unfunded mandates, welfare reform, or regulations that are strangling productivity, we took the stand that the States and local government should have a greater say about how people's lives are going to be run, and the Federal government less.

[13] There are dozens of works telling the tale of what the federal courts have done since the New Deal to change the nature of the allocation of legal powers among the local, state, and federal governments. My own attempt is Stephen B. Presser, Recapturing the Constitution: Race, Religion, and Abortion Reconsidered (1994). See also Stephen B. Presser & Jamil S. legal profession, which had formerly seen its role primarily as the preservers of property and the guardians of the civil rights of the citizenry now tended to become advocates against those running publicly-held corporations. Taking advantage of the contingency fee system unavailable in other industrialized nations, plaintiffs' lawyers proceeded to transform the nature of litigation.[14] In order to understand the magnitude of the change it is important to understand what litigation once was, and what it might perhaps once again become.

What Litigation Once Was

Litigation as we now know it did not exist in our colonial past nor in our mother country. It is true that seeking redress through the courts is as old as the beginnings of British North America. The Massachusetts body of liberties agreed to by the colonists of Massachusetts Bay in 1641 provided that there was a "right of every citizen with a grievance to have some court adjudicate it," but the focus was very much on the individual rights of citizens,[15] and not on any group of similarly situated litigants. The [14] Walter Olson, The Litigation Explosion 38 (1991) (indicating that contingency fees first arose as a means of ensuring that worthy and impecunious plaintiffs might still be able to gain redress, but that eventually contingency fees encouraged litigation that might well be meritless, but was driven by the possibility that lawyers might make more money.)

[15] To similar effect see III William Blackstone, commentaries on the Laws of England 2 (1768) ("The more effectually to accomplish the redress of private injuries, courts of justice are instituted in every civilized society, in order to protect the weak from the insults of the stronger, by expounding and enforcing those laws, by which rights are defined, and wrongs prohibited."), and Id, at 23 "it is a general and indisputable rule, that where there is a legal right, there is also a legal remedy, but suit or action at law, whenever that right is invaded." See also the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780, Declaration of Rights, Article XI, "Every subject of the Commonwealth ought to find a certain remedy by having recourse to the laws, for all injuries or wrongs which he may receive in his person, property or character. He ought to obtain right and justice freely, and without being obliged to purchase it; compleatly, and without any denial; promptly, and without delay; conformably to the laws."

common law, our English heritage of following precedents previously laid down, evolved a system of "common law" pleading whereby causes of action were clearly defined, and each one had a designated "writ" that would begin proceedings, and each one had particular pleadings that were to be filed as the proceedings were contested and litigated. It was a maxim that for every wrong there was a remedy at law, but the truth was that there were a myriad of matters that simply were outside the court system. Acts of God, inevitable accidents, sickness, death, and many other matters simply did not give rise to private causes of action. If one's case did not fit in the narrow definitions of trespass, trespass on the case, trover, replevin, assumpsit or the rest, one was simply out of luck.

Rather than seeking to eliminate this specialized system of redress for some, but clearly not all grievances, Americans as diverse as Alexander Hamilton, Thomas Jefferson, Joseph Story, and Abraham Lincoln all praised the wisdom of the common law and wished to preserve it for America, although abandoning the elements of the common law that sustained the English Aristocracy and Monarchy. Those parts of the common law that dealt with what we would now call contracts, property, torts, and civil rights, however, were preserved entire and intact. Thus, in a famous passage in Thomas Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, he reports that when, in 1776, he was assigned the task of suggesting revisions to the law of the new state of Virginia, he wanted to abolish slavery, to diminish the number of crimes that were punished capitally, and to set up an hierarchical public school system, but he wanted to preserve wholesale these parts of the common law of contracts, property, torts, and civil rights[16] (although he objected to the [16] Jefferson describes these as "The Common law of England, by which is meant, that part of the English law which was anterior to the date of the oldest statutes extant," which Jefferson stated was "the basis" of the 1776 revisal of the laws of Virginia. Thomas Jefferson, Notes on the State of Virginia (1781), excerpted English practice of wearing of wigs in court).

It probably does not go too far to say that the old common law system of pleading, through specialized writs and arcane practices, because it required the assistance of lawyers, was designed to preserve and protect that class, and the obfuscatory character of common law pleading led some Americans even to suggest that lawyers ought not to be a necessary class in our republic.[17] Nevertheless, common law pleading, in some form, persisted until the first third of the twentieth century. One suspects that not only did common law pleading protect and advance the interest of lawyers, but this specialized system, by raising the costs of litigation, and by narrowing the bases for it, actually discouraged going to court. It was originally a mainstay of the Anglo-American legal culture that one should try one's best to resolve disputes out of court, that litigation was something of an evil, [18] and that it ought to be resorted to only if all other means failed. A litigious society was a fractured society, and many Americans valued community enough to erect roadblocks to discourage recourse to the courts. Common law pleading was a part of that, as were the old common law doctrines of champerty and maintenance that punished lawyers who actively stirred up litigation.[19] Indeed, Sir William Blackstone, the greatest Eighteenth Century commentator on the English Common Law, railed against those who promoted litigation, seeking to bargain for what we would now label

[17] The most famous such assertion is Honestus [pseud. of Benjamin Austin], Observations on the Pernicious Practice of the Law (Boston, 1819), reprinted in 13 Am. J. Legal Hist. 241 (1969) (Arguing that lawyers are simply not a "necessary order" in a republic.)

[18] See, e.g. Olson, supra note __, at 2, where he observes that litigation in America was originally seen as an evil.

contingency fees, calling them "the pests of civil society, that are perpetually endeavoring to disturb the repose of their neighbors, and officiously interfering in other men's quarrels."[20]

One of America's greatest lawyer-presidents made a similar point when he wrote, in an apparently undelivered law lecture, that good lawyers should > [d]iscourage litigation. Persuade your neighbors to compromise whenever you can. Point out to them how the nominal winner is often a real loser -- in fees, expenses, and waste of time. As a peacemaker the lawyer has a superior opportunity of being a good man. There will still be business enough.

>
> Never stir up litigation. A worse man can scarcely be found than one who does this. Who can be more nearly a fiend than he who habitually overhauls the register of deeds in search of defects in titles, whereon to stir up strife, and put money in his pocket? A moral tone ought to be infused into the profession which should drive such men out of it.[21]

Code Pleading and Other Changes in Litigation

Somehow all of that began to change in the twentieth century, if not before. As early as the middle of the nineteenth century David Dudley Field (the lawyer who founded the first modern great law firm, Sherman and Sterling) successfully convinced New York legislators to replace the system of common law pleading with "code pleading."[22] This was a simplified procedure, dictated by statute rather than the common law, whereby litigants were no longer bound by the forms of action, but could much more simply state their cases and reply to their adversary's charges. The Field Code of Civil Procedure was adopted in whole or in part in twenty-four other states (and also in England and Ireland),[23] but common law pleading lingered well into the twentieth century, and, oddly enough, was still being taught to first-year law students in one civil procedure classes at Harvard in the fall of 1968.[24]

By 1937, however, the pressure to do away with common law pleading was irresistible, and in that year rules were promulgated for the federal courts that obliterated the writ system.[25] These new federal rules, or something like them, were soon adopted by many state courts as well, and the foundation for what Walter Olson has called "the litigation explosion"[26] was beginning to be erected. The notion that lawyers shouldn't encourage litigation was dealt a fatal blow by two key decisions, Bates v. State Bar of Arizona (1977),[27] in which the United States Supreme Court, in an opinion by justice Blackmun, who apparently wanted to encourage lawsuits and deplored the "underutilization" of lawyers' services,[28] held that the First Amendment protected lawyers "commercial speech" rights to advertise the availability and price of routine legal services, and Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel (1985)[29], in which the Court permitted lawyers to solicit specific legal business against particular manufacturing defendants.[30]

Decisions such as Bates and Zauderer, and the increased availability of class actions, created a situation in which it was open season on assorted purported corporate wrongdoers. Litigation, in effect, became a pro-active means of redistribution, if not class warfare. With the rise of "public interest" lawfirms, or private or publicly-funded "legal aid" clinics, groups of lawyers were subsidized not by their potential clients, but by taxpayer or charitable contributions, and, as a result, even more litigation against particularly unfavored corporate or institutional defendants became possible.[31] Lawyers, rather than clients often came to control and encourage litigation. Blackstone and the old common lawyers would have been horrified.

Cultural Change led to Litigation Change

The changes in the nature of litigation undoubtedly were part of much broader cultural changes in this country, cultural changes which accelerated during the sixties and seventies. The story is a familiar one to those of us who lived through it, but since Americans tend to have little appreciation for their history, even their recent history, it may not be amiss to review some of those developments. Probably as a result of the deeply unpopular Vietnam conflict and the nearly contemporaneous Watergate affair (which still captures the imagination of many, as the recent revelation of "Deep Throat" shows) most Americans, and certainly most of what we now call the "mainstream media," appear to have come to believe that government could not be trusted, and that this was also true generally of large purportedly impersonal corporations. Perhaps as a result of the culture becoming increasingly dominated by the "baby boom" generation, and because that generation was characterized by much less religious and civic commitment than prior generations, and by a rather hedonistic individualism, it is not surprising that the law and legal institutions changed as well. As Americans searched for "self-actualization," as the conservative aspects of the legal profession which discouraged litigation began to erode, and as "public interest" law firms arose to become, as it were, professional plaintiffs, the law itself was eventually dramatically altered.

[31] Cf. Chayes, supra note ___, at 1291, observing that the class action "responds to the proliferation of more or less well-organized groups in our society and the tendency to perceive interests as group interest, at least in very important aspects." See, to similar effect, Olson, supra note ___, at 52-53, concluding that lawsuits were originally understood to be a dispute between two private citizens over private rights, but came to be understood as a tool to liberate people whose rights had been taken away, and to prevent such rights from being taken away in the future.

In particular, it became more and more difficult to argue that those who suffered any kind of harm, especially from use of commercially-manufactured products, were not entitled to compensation from the corporations who manufactured those items. Thus it was that "strict products liability" replaced negligence as the basis for manufacturer's liability to consumers, tenants became more easily able to look to landlords for any injury suffered by renters, and consumers found it easier to escape from contracts by arguing that businesses had taken "unconscionable" advantage of them.[32]

In the nineteenth century, in a period dominated by a culture of self-sacrifice and religious obligation, it may have been believed that limiting the liability of active individuals and organizations eventually redounded to the benefit of all, and by limiting such liability there would be more investment in productive enterprise, which would eventually result in greater overall wealth for the citizenry.[33] These were the days of "laissez-faire" when law and lawyers apparently believed that it was best to leave entrepreneurs substantially alone, and to let the market rather than the state or federal governments regulate enterprise.[34] New private law doctrines, however, seemed to have been spawned by a legal culture that favored regulation over acquiescence, and redistribution over private enterprise.

These private law developments, principally in the state courts, were the analogues of the public law developments, primarily in the federal courts, which also signaled major cultural change. Thus the Warren Court struck down school prayer and bible riding in the public schools in the states, mandated an end to racial segregation, declared that population was the only permissible basis for elections to either branches of the state legislature (even though the United States Senate itself furnished a glaring argument to the contrary), and dictated the reformation of state criminal procedure in order to prevent police abuse of criminal defendants, many of whom were believed to be members of disadvantaged minorities. Much of this was accomplished through the work of organizations formed at least in part to promote litigation, such as the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Litigation, formerly a tool of last resort for individuals, now became a first choice method of social transformation for groups. None of this is necessarily to suggest that many or most of these individual decisions did not advance the cause of justice in their particular cases, but, taken together they contributed to a culture in which many more actors were subject to lawsuits, and in which bureaucracy could (even unintentionally) stifle enterprise.[35]

Where We Are Now

The last few years have seen the culmination of many of these efforts in even more daring judicial decisions, such as those that have found prohibitions in the Constitution against restricting abortions[36] and against punishing consensual homosexual acts,[37] or those that have read the Fourteenth Amendment to require mandatory busing of students to achieve racial balance in the schools,[38] or to permit affirmative action on the basis of race, at least in college and graduate school admissions.[39] All of these were

Presser, "A conservative comment on Professor Crump," 56

United States Supreme Court decisions, but dramatic decisions in the state courts, such as that of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts which found in the Massachusetts state constitution a right to gay marriage,[40] were similar in spirit. In the Massachusetts gay marriage case, in fact, the Court relied heavily on the so-called "mystery passage" from one of the United States Supreme Court's abortion decisions, which stated that "At the heart of liberty is the right to define one's own concept of existence, of meaning, of the universe, and of the mystery of human life. Beliefs about these matters could not define the attributes of personhood were they formed under the compulsion of the state."[41] A more naïve or more extreme statement of hedonistic individualism would be difficult to articulate, and it summed up in few words the legal ethos of the age.

Again, however, it should be noted that the wisdom of the policies favoring abortion, the legalization of consensual homosexual acts, or gay marriage are not the issue addressed here. Instead it is the attitude of the Supreme Court that it should be the ultimate authority on these matters, guided by the philosophy encapsulated in the "mystery passage," and by a sense that it should authoritatively expand and alter the meaning of the Constitution in order to keep it in tune with the times. The mystery passage's philosophy leads to a view of society in which there is little common purpose, and an invitation to litigate against all traditional practices, instead of leaving matters to be worked out on a state-by-state basis through the emergence of a consensus among the people.

The reforms of Rule 23 which led to the class action as we know it were undoubtedly instituted because of a belief that an approach to litigation that enabled groups that had formerly been the subject of discrimination to join in seeking remedies would result in a more just society. Unfortunately, because of all the other cultural factors suggested here, the net effect of current class action practice may be to produce more harm than good.

Once the restrictive characteristics of the forms of action had been abandoned, and once an individualistic philosophy of the kind expressed in the mystery passage had taken hold, it might have been expected that a plethora of new causes of action would be created, and it was only a matter of time before the lawsuit as political tool could come into being. All that was needed was the abandonment of traditional institutional and cultural restraints on litigating.

This came when the individualistic philosophy of the mystery passage, for most purposes, obliterated an older Athenian or Judeo-Christian ethos, still dominant in the Nineteenth Century, which understood reversals of fortune or accidental bereavement as occasions for spiritual growth, rather than opportunities for seeking redress in the courts. As the federal courts continued to render decisions which all but obliterated the legitimacy of religious expressions in the public square,[42] the restraining character of religion eroded, and the "litigation explosion" occurred.

[42] See, e.g., Lee v. Weisman. 505 US 577 (1992) (Holding, by a 5-4 majority, that middle-school graduations could not include a prayer delivered by a clergyman selected by the school), Santa Fe Independent School Dist. v. Doe. 530 US 290 (2000) (Prohibiting, in a 6-3 ruling, school-endorsed student-led prayer at high school football games. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, in his dissenting opinion, joined by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, observed that "even more disturbing than its holding is the tone of the Court's opinion; it bristles with hostility to all things religious in public life. Neither the holding nor the tone of the opinion is faithful to the meaning of the Establishment Clause, when it is recalled that George Washington himself, at the request of the very Congress which passed the Bill of Rights, proclaimed a day of "public thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed by acknowledging with grateful hearts the many and signal favors of Almighty God." 530 U.S., at 318.

And thus we have the current situation where plaintiffs' lawyers, in effect, manufacture classes suffering injury, often in an effort to seek settlements for their "nuisance value," rather than actually to recover compensation for purported victims. Similarly, as indicated earlier, we have state attorneys general pursuing actions against whole industries, as has been done, for example, against the tobacco industry, seeking to enhance state revenues through spectacular recoveries, or, as New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has done against the Insurance and Mutual Fund industries, to reinforce his political standing and solidify a possible bit for higher office (or so his critics suggest).[43] In short, litigation conceived as a remedy for the redress of individual grievances has become a political device to be used by ambitious office-holders as well as an instrument of intimidation by ambitious private lawyers.

Some Ameliorative Efforts activities of professional plaintiffs in the securities fraud area, in medical malpractice awards, and in other areas of civil justice reform, but there are still difficulties unique to the American legal system at the moment, and utterly unknown to the common law.

The most prominent of these has already been mentioned; the ability of plaintiffs' lawyers to take on cases on a contingent fee basis, and to advertise for clients, thus generating litigation on their own. Another is that we have not yet adopted the English "loser pays" rule, requiring that successful litigants have their counsel fees reimbursed by the unsuccessful party. Still another difficulty is our extraordinary system of pre-trial discovery, in which depositions, interrogatories, requests for document production, and other means of obtaining evidence from adversaries can easily run the costs of litigation for large publicly-held corporations into the millions, and can serve as powerful incentives to settle even meritless cases.

The United States Supreme Court, and some state legislatures have begun to take steps to reduce the colossal punitive damage verdicts we have seen in recent years,[44] but these efforts, especially by the state legislatures have sometimes been frustrated by state courts.[45] For the time being it is likely that the possibility of colossal punitive damages will continue to threaten corporate defendants, and, when the threat of punitive damages is combined with adverse inferences to be drawn from a failure to produce items for discovery, as recently occurred in the Morgan Stanley case,[46] it can be understood what a distance we have traveled from the time when litigation was about compensation, and compensation to individuals, not punishment of purported corporate miscreants.

Conclusion: What Ought to be Done

The organization that has sponsored this conference, Common Good, is devoted to reminding us of what our American ancestors understood, that social problems can be exacerbated rather than ameliorated by excessive litigation. As Philip Howard has recently demonstrated, for example, the encouragement of litigation by school children and their parents has resulted in a situation where order simply cannot be maintained in the classroom – where it is necessary to bring in the police to handcuff and cart away young miscreants lest some teacher be sued for an attempt physically to restrain an unruly child.[47] The lack of order in classrooms, of course, impedes their educational mission, and while encouraging litigation against educators was suppose to improve education, it has had the opposite effect.

Similarly, to the extent that class action litigation against corporations, along with its attendant evils of contingency fees, excessive discovery expenses, the threat of punitive damages, the capricious behavior of juries, and the bringing of class-action lawsuits with the aim of settlement for their nuisance value,[48] continues, the competitive

[48] As one of the leading civil procedure scholars, my colleague Martin Redish has observed "Though on its face the class action appears to be nothing more than an elaborate procedural joinder device, in recent years it has become the focal point of much political and legal debate. Courts have noted 'the intense presser to settle' caused by the very filing of a class action, while others believe the procedure amounts to 'judicial blackmail.'" Martin H. Redish, "Class Actions and the Democratic Difficulty: Rethinking the Intersection position of American corporations in the global economy will be undermined, and those who depend on such corporations for their livelihood, employees, creditors, consumers and stockholders will suffer. There will continue to be a few spectacular winners in the "lawsuit lottery," but most Americans may be worse, rather than better off.

Congress may have begun to travel the appropriate road to recovery with the recent reform regarding class actions,[49] but this has yet to be tested in the courts, and other Congressional measures, such as Sarbanes-Oxley, suggest that our legislators may still be imposing measures whose costs far exceed their benefits.[50] One recent estimate "puts investors' loss in stock value on passage of that act at around $1.4 trillion, an of Private Litigation and Public Goals," 2003 The University of Chicago Legal Forum 71. (footnotes omitted). Redish does go on to observe, however, that "Those who take a more positive view of the class action consider it to be an effective means of policing corporate behavior and an assurance that injured victims will be compensated in the most efficient manner." Id. (footnote omitted). Redish's own view is that current class action practice is inconsistent with popular sovereignty, or "the essential democratic precepts of accountability and representation." Id., at 137.

[49] The Class Action Fairness Act of 2005, which passed the House in a 279-149 vote and the Senate by a vote of 72-26, would move lawsuits seeking over $5 million, and thus "shift most large class-action lawsuits involving parties from different states to federal courts." The goal of the measure is to lessen the perceived arbitrary behavior of state court judges and juries. See generally William Branigin, "Congress Changes Class Action Rules," Washington Post, February 17, 2005. The new law does not, however, prevent the bringing of any class actions in federal courts, nor did it have any retroactive effect. In addition to shifting some class action lawsuits to federal courts the new law also should have the effect of reducing the recovery of counsel's contingency fees in class action litigation that results in coupons being distributed to members of the class. The contingency fees are to be figured on the basis of the value of the coupons redeemed rather than on the aggregate value of the coupons issued. "The Class Action Fairness Act was drafted and ultimately passed into law in response to a growing belief that class action lawsuits were nothing but vehicles for attorney abuse and large fees." Ruth Bahe-Jachna, Frank Citera and Collin Williams, "GT Alert:New Federal Legislation: The Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 (March 2005), available on the web at http://www.gtlaw.com/pub/alerts/2005/0302.asp.

[50] For this line of criticism against Sarbanes/Oxley see, e.g. Thomas J. Donohue, "Opening Keynote Address," Securities Industry Association, March 3, 2005, http://www.uschamber.com/press/speeches/2005/050303tjd_securities.htm ("When CEOs spend more time on regulatory compliance than they do strategizing, expanding, developing new product lines, and hiring new workers, the pendulum has swung too far . . .When qualified and responsible board directors are resigning their posts for fear of being held liable for a bad outcome, the pendulum has swung too far. . . When board members become overly concerned with protecting themselves and have less time and incentive to aggressively pursue the interests of the company and its shareholders, the pendulum has swung too far."), and Henry Manne, "Life After Donaldson," Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2005, Page A10 (Decrying the former Chairman of the SEC's championing of strick enforcement of Sarbanes/Oxley "in spite of mounting evidence that it is costly beyond any conceivable benefits.") expensive bit of retribution for a few multi-million dollar defalcations."[51] There is no denying that transparency in American entrepreneurial activity is a worthy goal, and the disclosure mandated by our securities laws and the efforts of the SEC and the courts to ferret out and punish securities fraud are certainly laudable. Nevertheless, it is time for intelligent leaders in and out of the Congress boldly to seek to change not only the pernicious practices and rules that have encouraged lawsuit abuse, but perhaps the very culture that has spawned them.[52]

As indicated above, there was a time when lawsuits were discouraged, and when the legal rules clearly favored the American active entrepreneur. There has always been some uncertainty to American law, dictated by its need simultaneously to implement popular sovereignty, economic development, restraints on arbitrary power, and the securing of a maximum amount of freedom from government regulation.[53] Before the middle of the twentieth century our legal and cultural regime discouraged litigation, and entrepreneurs had the freedom successfully to develop our economy to the point where it became the envy of the world.

That economy still flourishes, but it now does so in a climate in which no entrepreneur, and perhaps no American can be confident that he or she will not find themselves the subject of a lawsuit brought by a disgruntled competitor, an ambitious politician, or misguided government regulators. Surely at some point this climate will discourage the kinds of activities that Americans must engage in if we are to remain competitive in an increasingly-global economy. It is time for a change. We Americans tend to believe that one can't turn back the clock, but, as C.S. Lewis reminded us, when the clock fails to give you the correct time, that is precisely the move one should make.[54] If we really do want to alter a culture in which entrepreneurial actors and ordinary Americans, instead of being protected by law may too often end up its victims, there are lessons we could surely learn from our past.

[54] see C.S. LEWIS, We have Cause to Be Uneasy, in MERE CHRISTIANITY (1952), excerpted in THE ESSENTIAL C.S. LEWIS 309 (Lyle W. Dorset er., 1988) ("First, as to putting the clock back. Would you think I was joking if I said that you can put a clock back, and that if the clock is wrong it is often a very sensible thing to do? But I would rather get away from that whole idea of clocks. We all want progress. But progress means getting nearer to the place where you want to be. And if your have taken a wrong turning, then to go forward does not get you any nearer. If you are on the wrong road, progress means doing an about-turn and walking back to the right road . . . .").

THE ADMINISTRATIVE ADVANTAGE IN CIVIL PROCEDURE: TORT REFORM THROUGH CONSISTENT AND INTELLIGENT POLICIES APPLIED BY ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNALS

--- Substantive law is "secreted in the interstices of procedure"[2]

Most of the energy that has gone into "tort reform" in the United States to date has been misdirected. The features that create frivolous, abusive litigation in the U.S. are largely institutional and procedural in nature.[3] They inhere in the incentives created by our judicial institutions and procedures, and yet most of the energy of reformers to date has gone into modest reforms in substantive tort law – such as caps on punitive damages or on pain and suffering. These reforms may be symbolically satisfying to their proponents, but they leave untouched the basic institutions of our civil justice system and the perverse incentives that they create. Indeed, this misguided focus on changing substantive law is arguably even built into the generally-accepted term "tort reform," which seems to presume that the basic institutional and procedural structure of tort litigation should remain unchanged and that a few reforms of substantive tort law will be sufficient to deal with any problems.

One notable exception is the work of Professor John Langbein. In 1985, Professor Langbein wrote a much-cited article called "The German Advantage in Civil Procedure."[4] Langbein reviewed several salient aspect of German civil procedure including professional judges, the absence of juries and contingent fees, and greater use of independent experts and concluded that these procedural "advantages" contributed to the German system of civil litigation functioning better than the U.S. civil litigation system.

In the twenty years since Langbein wrote, however, there have been only a few modest efforts to address any of the underlying procedural and institutional aspects of U.S. civil litigation that he identified.[5] Ironically, our constitutional law and legal traditions, which are sometimes instruments of change in other areas, are one of the key impediments to modernizing the institutional and procedural aspects of our civil litigation system. Constitutional law as well as the even broader "unwritten constitution" of our legal traditions make it difficult to adopt innovations for processing damage claims that have proven successful elsewhere. Many of the problematic features of adversary civil litigation before courts and juries are so deeply ingrained into our constitutional law and legal traditions that it would be virtually impossible to change them. While the issue of whether constitutional law should "change with the times" is increasingly controversial in every area, the constitutional law relating to civil procedure is remarkably backward-looking and static. The avowed purpose of the 7th Amendment, for example, is to [4] John Langbein, The German Advantage in Civil Procedure, 52 U.CHI.L.REV. 823 (1985).

[5] One exception (in which the author was personally involved) was the effort to increase the use of independent experts recommended by professional societies which was recommended first by the Carnegie Commission for Science, Technology and Government and then picked up and implemented as a pilot program by the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

"preserve" unchanged the functions of the civil jury as they existed at common law as understood in 1791. More generally, when an innovation in civil litigation is challenged on procedural due process grounds, courts generally look backward to our history and traditions to determine whether it is constitutional. And even if a reform to the civil litigation system might conceivably be upheld in court against a formal constitutional challenge, there is an even broader "unwritten constitution" of political support that renders it virtually impossible to conceive of any legislature making material changes to the way that civil litigation is traditionally conducted before courts and juries.[6] Even relatively recent innovations such as broad civil discovery have proved very difficult to curtail once implemented.

There is, however, an alternative route by which American law could conceivably address some of more problematic aspects of the ways that we currently do civil litigation. That is through the legal fiction that "administrative tribunals" are not "courts."[7] Throughout our history, one of the main reasons for replacing traditional adversary civil litigation before courts and juries with administrative remedies before non-court courts (a.k.a. "quasi-judicial" administrative tribunals) is an enhanced ability by lawmakers to re-design the institutional and procedural features of the tribunals that apply the law as well as to change substantive law. One useful definition of an "administrative agency" is an institution of government that is not a court or legislature

---

[6] See, e.g. Peter Schuck, How to Respond to the Problems of the Civil Jury, 77 JUDICATURE 236, 239 (1994)("The politics of jury reform are daunting. Virtually all of the important groups with stakes in the system of civil litigation favor retaining the jury. Trial lawyers' veneration of the jury is almost religious in its fervor, and their missionary zeal appears to have won many converts among the general public. When queried about the value of the jury, judges almost invariably praise it.")

[7] For a general argument about the role of legal fictions in promoting legal change, see Lon Fuller, Legal Fictions (1969).

but is created and designed by statute.[8] Whereas the institutional aspects of "courts" are relatively fixed by constitutional law and tradition, administrative tribunals are by definition plastic and capable of being designed in many different forms. Administrative agencies are not one thing, but come in a dizzying variety of shape and sizes, with different institutional arrangements and procedures designed by statute or regulation to fit the particular task at hand. Indeed, the key defining feature of administrative institutions is that they are not "courts," and therefore their features can be custom-designed in ways that are not permissible for courts. Virtually every procedural innovation identified by Langbein, including professional judges, the elimination of juries and the enhanced role for independent expertise, currently exists in America, but in litigation before "administrative tribunals" rather than before "courts."

As a consequence, a major trend in U.S. civil law during the 20th century has been, and will continue to be, the removal of certain subject matter areas of law in which institutional features of litigation before traditional courts have proved particularly troublesome from the traditional litigation system and the substitution of alternative remedies before administrative tribunals in their place. This long-term trend to substitute administrative remedies for common law litigation has occurred in the past with regulation of workplace safety, labor relations, securities regulation and environmental pollution, and is likely to occur next with exposure to toxic substances such as asbestos, and then in medical malpractice and product liability. Medical malpractice, product liability and mass toxic tort litigation are particularly good candidates for "The

[8] Compare Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §551(1), which defines an "agency" as "each authority of the Government of the United States, ... but does not include the Congress; the courts of the United States" and other exceptions not relevant here.

Administrative Advantage in Civil Procedure" because defining a consistent and intelligent standard of care is particularly important in these fields. Administrative law offers particular advantages when implementing a consistent standard of care across a large number of claims is important, and administrative bodies are also particularly good at up-dating a technical standard of care based on expertise and experience – or what I call an "intelligent" standard of care, because it learns over time.

It is impossible in a short article to discuss all of the institutional and procedural features of U.S. civil litigation that might be improved in administrative forums. In what follows I will therefore attempt to illustrate "The Administrative Advantage in Civil Procedure" with one specific illustration: the claim by some reformers, including Phillip Howard, that verdicts by civil juries are unpredictable and inconsistent. In what follows, I will briefly outline the claim that civil jury verdicts with regard to the standard of care in medical malpractice cases are unpredictable and inconsistent, and then explain why this tendency is difficult to correct in the context of ordinary civil litigation before courts but much easier to address before administrative tribunals. Examples of such administrative tribunals would include the administrative "health courts" proposed by Common Good for medical malpractice reform[9] or the administrative compensation

[9] For more details, see Common Good, An Urgent Call for Special Health Courts, http://cgood.org/brochure-hcare-4.html

The essence of the Common Good proposal is as follows: "Health courts would have judges dedicated full-time to resolving healthcare disputes. The judges would make written rulings in every case to provide guidance on proper standards of care. Their rulings would set precedents on which both patients and doctors could rely. As with similar administrative courts that exist in other areas of law—for tax disputes, workers' compensation, and vaccine liability, among others—there would be no juries. To assure uniformity and predictability, each ruling could be appealed to a new Medical Appellate Court." Ibid.

Other features of the Common Good proposal are:

"Full-Time Judges.
The hallmark of the health courts would be full-time judges, dedicated solely to addressing healthcare cases. The judges would be appointed through a nonpartisan system for asbestos proposed in S.852 (the so-called FAIR Act), which recently was voted out of committee in the Senate.[10]

The purpose of this paper is not to defend the specifics of these reform proposals as either necessary or sufficient, a task that has been performed elsewhere by others.[11] (It should be acknowledged, however, that the author was an early advocate of administrative compensation funds like the asbestos proposal[12] and serves as a consultant to Common Good.) Rather, the point of the present paper is that most if not all of the reforms in these proposals cannot be accomplished within the existing court-based litigation system, but can be implemented through administrative tribunals.

screening commission.
Neutral Experts.
Those judges would be able to choose from a panel of experts in each area of medicine, avoiding the dueling "hired gun" experts that confuse and prolong disputes today.
Speedy Proceedings; Lower Costs.
Most cases would be resolved within months. Except in exceptional cases, legal fees would be held to 20 percent, reducing current costs by almost half.
Liberalized Recovery for Injured Patients.
Once a mistake is verified, recovery would be automatic without the need to prove precisely how it happened.
Damages.
Patients would be reimbursed for all of their medical costs and lost income, plus a fixed sum that would be pre-determined according to a schedule addressing specific types of injuries. The schedule would be established by a panel of experts and updated periodically to reflect changing costs."

[10] The text of the FAIR Act as reported out by the Senate Judiciary Committee is available at http://documents.nam.org/IS/S852asreportedfromcmte061705.pdf The bill is 393 pages in length, so it is impossible to summarize its provisions in detail here. For present purposes, one pertinent feature is that the bill would replace case-by-case litigation in asbestos cases with "tiers" developed by a combination of statute and administrative rulemaking for determining both compensation payments to claimants and payments by defendants into the system.

II.

In a 2003 op-ed in The New York Times, Phillip K. Howard succinctly stated the case that existing court procedures in medical malpractice cases create a highly undesirable element of unpredictability.[13] Howard argues that "Studies about jury awards in health care confirm what every doctor fears – and every victim should fear: justice is random."[14] He goes on to argue that "in a civil case, where citizens can use the justice system as an offensive weapon, the most important social value is predictability."[15] Howard's proposed solution (about which we will have more to say later) is that judges, not juries should decide the standard of care:

> "Creating a reliable system of medical justice, however, requires changing one aspect of the system that is so ingrained it is hardly even part of the debate: the jury. Expert judges, not juries, must decide what is a valid claim. … The role of juries in civil cases is to decide disputed facts, like whether someone is telling the truth. It is not to declare standards of care that affect society as a whole."[16]

Proponents of asbestos reform make similar claims: that verdicts in asbestos cases are inherently capricious, and as a result, some people who are not really sick get huge windfalls, while others who are much sicker get little or nothing.[17] One of the major justifications advanced for the pending bills to replace traditional tort litigation in asbestos cases with an administrative compensation system is that it would give greater predictability and horizontal fairness to both claimants and defendants than the current system of case-by-case litigation.

Speaking more generally, Yale Law School Professor Peter H. Schuck has identified as one of the recurrent "major objections" to the civil jury to be the contention that jury verdicts are inherently unpredictable and produce a "noisy" or unclear liability signal:

> "These objections do not claim that juries are biased or prone to error, but rather than jury decisions by their very nature emit liability signals that are confusing, inconsistent, and arbitrary. In this view, the jury's signals convey little useful information about actual legal norms. Coupled with the largely unregulated, generous system of damage awards, jury decisions generate widespread uncertainty, anxiety, and risk avoidance."[18]

Defenders of the civil jury do not generally deny that juries "march to a different drummer," but argue instead that juries are able to reflect a number of situational and community norms that are not always fully captured in the formal law. For example, in a 1988 article, Professor E. Donald Elliott stated that toxic tort cases are "morality plays" rather than based on a strict application of law and science.[19] While this statement was intended as descriptive rather than normative or prescriptive, it has been strongly criticized as countenancing the right of juries to decide toxic tort cases based on factors that would be considered irrelevant as a matter of formal law.[20] Similarly, then-professor, now-judge Guido Calabresi and his co-author, Professor Phillip Bobbitt, glory in the ability of a civil jury, which they call an "aresponsible agency," to decide cases without giving any reasons for its decision, particularly in certain categories of cases involving what they call "tragic choices" in which they believe that it is desirable for society to violate in practice the norms that it nonetheless affirms in theory. [21]

III.

In contrast to the civil jury, which is either praised or condemned for its inconsistency, inscrutability and unpredictability, consistency of application and transparency in giving reasons for outcomes are two of the most highly-valued norms for administrative tribunals. As Justice Scalia recently wrote for a unanimous Supreme Court, "It is hard to imagine a more violent breach of [the requirement of reasoned decision-making by administrative tribunals] than applying a rule of primary conduct ... which is in fact different than the rule or standard formally announced."[22] Indeed, a central focus of judicial review of decisions by administrative tribunals is to police against "arbitrary and capricious" decisions that do not treat like cases alike or are not adequately justified.[23] Administrative tribunals must generally follow strict rules requiring them to state reasons for their decisions, and if they apply a different rule of decision in one case that they do in another, they must state a rational basis for the difference in treatment or provide a reasoned basis for changing the rule that will be applied in future cases.[24] In administrative law, "There may not be a rule for Monday, another for Tuesday, a rule for general application, but denied outright in a specific case."[25]

Administrative law also provides a useful conceptual resource for dealing with standard of care issues that is generally lacking in civil litigation: the concept of a generic "policy." Court generally deploy only two conceptual categories to describe the allocation of roles between judges and juries: questions of "law," and questions of "fact." Everything has to be one or the other. But before an administrative tribunal, there is an important third category: called "policy."[26] A "policy" is not a fixed requirement established by law, nor is it a "fact" that may change from case to case; rather, a "policy" is a contingent or prudential judgment that must be applied consistently while it remains in effect but may be changed from time to time in the light of experience. The standard of care in a medical malpractice case, or the showing required to qualify for compensating persons exposed to asbestos, are good examples of "policies," that are neither purely matters of law nor purely matters of fact.

Administrative agencies make policy in a variety of ways, including generic notice-and-comment rules, guidance documents and announcing rules of decision through case-by-case litigation.[27] However, the strong trend in administrative law since the early 1970's is to constrain case-by-case litigation of "facts" by developing generic "policies" through rulemaking that reflect the agency's general expertise as to how individual cases should be treated. The intellectual leader in promoting the use of rulemaking to reduce arbitrariness and promote consistency was Professor Kenneth Culp Davis, who spent most of his career at the University of Chicago Law School.[28] Uniform generic policies are then applied in individual cases, but can change and evolve in the light of experience. A good example is the Social Security medical disability grid regulations that were upheld by a unanimous Supreme Court in Heckler v. Campbell, 461 U.S. 458 (1983). Confronted with an unacceptable diversity of results in similar cases, the Reagan Administration first attempted to achieve a greater uniformity through management controls and a "Quality Assurance Program," but this approach was challenged in court as infringing on the independence of Administrative Law Judges, who varied widely in how they decided cases.[29] That approach having proven inadequate, the Administration then promulgated a generic rule setting specific, relatively objective criteria for when a person is or is not considered "disabled."

In 1999, the Social Security disability system provided $51 billion in payments to 6.5 million beneficiaries at an administrative cost of $1.5 billion, or about 3%,[30] which compares very favorably with the transaction costs of the torts system which run as high as 50% in some studies. The system generates about 600,000 disputed claims a year, and 200,000 appeals to the Appeals Council. "The volume of Appeals Council decisions precludes the development of any "common law" of administrative review; rather, if the review process uncovers needs for new policy or clarification, that policy or clarification is supplied by regulation or similar directives to all decisionmakers in the system."[31]

Thus, policy decisions across the system are supplied not by a common law process of deciding appeals, but by relatively specific generic rules of policy that are developed by experts and apply across the system until updated in the light of experience.

Many other administrative systems also use a process of generic rulemaking based on expert policy decisions to guide and constrain the issues to be decided in individual adjudicatory hearings. For example, at one time, the Food and Drug Administration decided on a case by case basis in adjudicatory hearings on individual new drug application whether the particular scientific studies presented were adequate to prove safety and efficacy, and those judgments were both time-consuming and frequently litigated. Beginning in the late 1960's, however, FDA promulgated generic policy standards for what constitutes "well-controlled clinical studies" and in a precedent-setting decision in 1973, the Supreme Court ruled that generic policymaking by the agency could constrain the issues in individual adjudicatory hearings.[32] Or to pick another example, when the Environmental Protection Agency holds hearings on cleaning up an individual Superfund site, the assessment of risks by the decisionmaker is guided and constrained by a detailed generic rule called the "National Contingency Plan" which outlines EPA's policies and procedures for how a site should be cleaned up.[33]

Questions of standard of care that are currently decided by a case by case basis by juries in the tort system could be regulated and made more uniform by generic policies promulgated at the administrative level and updated from time to time in the light of experience.[34] In fact, the pending asbestos trust legislation would utilize administrative rulemaking to determine the levels of contributions by defendants into the system, and also to set criteria to determine levels of payouts, within broad ranges set by the legislature,.

Generic policy judgments are not only applied relatively consistently by administrative agencies, but they can also be designed to be intelligent, in the sense that procedures can be designed to bring technical expertise to bear, to analyze collateral consequences and to update policies in the light of experience. These complex multi-faceted technical issues of regulatory policy are currently made in a haphazard, uncoordinated and inept fashion in the distorting context of individual claims by injured people by lay juries that do not understand (and often prohibited from even hearing evidence about) the broader implications of their decisions. That is because these issues are incorrectly conceived to be "questions of fact," when in truth they are neither questions of law for a judge nor questions of fact for a jury, but rather they are questions of regulatory policy (a conceptual category that is sadly missing from traditional judicial thinking about tort law, but is alive and well in administrative law). As policy questions, they should be made in a more centralized way by more specialized institutions that can weigh the pro's and con's of proposed policy decisions in a more systematic way after due deliberation and consideration of relevant technical expertise (such as costs and benefits, substitution risks and incentive effects). Moreover, institutions making important decisions of regulatory and compensation policy should be designed to study the actual results of particular policies over time and to change them in the light of experience.[35] The current tort system of case-by-case litigation before lay judges and juries has none of these features, in large part because it is incapable of separating the regulatory policy decisions from the compensation decisions in cases brought by individual claimants who are often suffering and are therefore sympathetic.[36]

It would be difficult, if not impossible, for Constitutional reasons to bring greater predictability to jury verdicts involving the standard of care. Unlike administrative law, which uses three conceptual categories (law, fact and policy), the 7th Amendment has been construed as creating only two realms, "law" and "fact," and traditionally questions of the standard of care have been seen as falling on the "fact" side of the line.

The fundamental purpose of the 7th Amendment, according to an unbroken line of Supreme Court cases, is to preserve inviolate the allocation of issues of "law" to the judge and of "fact" to the jury as those concepts existed and were applied in 1791. The 7th Amendment has for its primary purposes the preservation of "the common law distinction between the province of the court and that of the jury, whereby, in the absence of express or implied consent to the contrary, issues of law are resolved by the court and issues of fact are to be determined by the jury under appropriate instructions by the court." [37]

The question of whether the meaning of our Constitution should evolve and change with the times is, of course, one of the central, enduring controversies in Constitutional law and judicial philosophy. Almost uniquely, however, the specific content of established 7th Amendment law is to "preserve," unchanged and unchanging, the allocation of responsibilities between judge and jury as they existed in 1791. In other words, the content of the rule of decision that the Supreme Court has traditionally applied in construing the 7th Amendment is explicitly historical: how were these allocations of responsibility made in 1791? "Those matters which were tried to a jury in England in 1791 are to be so tried today and those matters which, as in equity, were tried to a judge in England in 1791 are to be so tried today...."[38]

It is well-established under a long line of Supreme Court's cases under the Jones Act and elsewhere that under the 7th Amendment, the issue of the reasonableness of conduct is considered an issue of "fact" that (1) is constitutionally required to be decided by a jury and (2) cannot be re-examined by a judge or appellate court – provided of course that there is at least some minimal evidence upon which a jury could reasonably base a finding of liability. A good example is International Co. v. Nederl. Amerik, 393 U.S. 74 (1968), a unanimous per curiam decision of the Supreme Court. In that case, the evidence showed that a longshoreman had remained below decks where carbon monoxide was building up because a supervisor had promised to turn on the ship's ventilating system. As explained by the Supreme Court, "The Court of Appeals said that the hatch boss should have ceased work when he first learned that the ship's ventilating system was not operating, despite the officer's promise to turn on the system. Alternatively, he should have used the stevedore's blowers, which had been left on the pier, to ventilate the hold. The jury, however, in response to a special interrogatory, found that the stevedore had acted reasonably in continuing to work for a brief period in reliance on the officer's promise. We cannot agree with the Court of Appeals that the stevedore acted unreasonably as a matter of law. Under the Seventh Amendment, that issue should have been left to the jury's determination."[39]

One can of course distinguish the level of precaution taken against carbon monoxide poisoning on a ship from the level of care that a surgeon uses in conducting an operation, or a physician uses in prescribing a drug with known side effects, but the courts have generally held that the question of whether particular conduct is reasonable under all the circumstances is prototypically a question of fact for the jury, not a question of law for the court.

To be sure, judges could conceivably become more aggressive in granting directed verdicts or judgments n.o.v. on the grounds that the facts would not permit a reasonable jury to find the defendant liable, but this is likely to be of only marginal benefit in improving the consistency of jury verdicts. In the first place, the capacity of non-specialized judges without medical training to second-guess juries on technical questions can easily be over-rated; without expert guidance, how is a lay judge to say that a jury verdict on standard of care is "unreasonable"? A more promising approach might be for the judge to rely on a neutral expert, or panels of neutral experts.[40] But while these approaches may be marginal improvements, they are inherently case-specific and ad hoc and therefore do not capture and build intelligence in the system over time in the way that development of administrative policy guidance does.

It is of course theoretically possible to imagine that any existing body of legal doctrine might be abandoned or re-worked by the Supreme Court. But absent an outright repeal of the language of the 7th Amendment, it seems exceedingly unlikely that the Court will abandon its historical approach to determining the allocation of responsibilities between judge and jury in civil case. The most promising development that might persuade the Supreme Court to re-think the role of the civil jury in determining the standard of care is historical research showing that in actuality, some standard of care issues were decided historically at common law by judges rather than juries. For example, the Court's "reasoning" in one of its most recent 7th Amendment cases consisted of the following: "After the adoption of the Seventh Amendment, federal courts followed this English common law in treating the civil penalty suit as a particular type of an action in debt, requiring a jury trial. See, e. g., United States v. Mundell, 27 F. Cas. 23 (No. 15,834) (CC Va. 1795)."[41] Absent new historical research, however, it seems unlikely that that Supreme Court will abandon its well-established and often-reiterated jurisprudence that standard of care issues are prototypical issues of "fact" for the jury, not issues of "law" for the judge.

The clear trend throughout the last half century has been to expand, rather than contract the role of the jury. For example, in 1970 when the Supreme Court was presented with the question of the role of juries in stockholders derivative actions, to which the closest historical analogy was a suit in equity in which no jury was required, the Court nonetheless held that a jury was required under the 7th Amendment if similar issues could have been raised in jury cases.[42] Moreover, in a series of cases, the Court held that the right to a jury trial cannot be abridged by trying factual issues first in an equitable proceeding and then using collateral estoppel to preclude re-litigation in a subsequent proceeding at law.[43] And in what is perhaps the most far-reaching precedent expanding the role of the common law jury, in 1974, the court held in Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. 189 (1974), that even new statutory causes of action that clearly did not exist in 1791 also required jury trials if the relief sought could be analogized to that available historically in common law causes of action.[44] This holding was followed again in Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412 (1987), although a ray of light may have emerged in that the Court held that a jury was required only for the liability phase of a Clean Water Act enforcement action, not to determine relief. The Supreme Court recently reiterated these principles again in Great-West Life & Annuity Insurance Co. v. Knudson, 534 U.S. 204 (2002), holding that a suit for money damages under ERISA is not equitable relief, but

"at law," and therefore requires a jury. In short, the clear trend in 7th Amendment jurisprudence for the last century has not been to constrain but to expand the role of civil juries.

While it is true that the 7th Amendment is not "incorporated" as binding on the states through the 14th Amendment, nonetheless jury trials are guaranteed in similar if not identical terms in virtually all 50 state constitutions. There is no perceptible trend at the state level to re-allocate standard of care issues to judges rather than juries, and any movement to do so would confront similar problems at the level of state constitutional law.

It would require a major abandonment of the Supreme Court's 7th Amendment jurisprudence, and analogous bodies of law at the state level, to hold that questions of negligence or standard of care are questions of law for the court, rather than questions of fact for the jury.

V.

One reason that American constitutional law has been able to permit itself the luxury of preserving "inviolate" the right to a civil jury as it existed in 1791 is that there is an escape valve by which Congress may re-assign many, if not most, controversies to a non-jury forum if it so chooses. As discussed above, a broad right to a civil jury trial attaches even to new statutory causes of action unknown at common law if, but only if, Congress chooses to create rights enforceable in a traditional court by a damage action (or other "legal" relief). But Congress also has the alternative option of creating new statutory schemes to replace traditional ones and making them enforceable through administrative tribunals that do not utilize juries instead of courts – at least if the nature of the right in question is deemed "public" rather than "private"[45] (a distinction of some complexity, which is discussed in more detail below).

A major trend in U.S. law over the last century is for many areas of law that were traditionally the province of common law courts and juries to be re-assigned to administrative mechanisms. For example, the Occupational Safety and Health Act now regulates issues of safety in the workplace that were formerly the subject of common law suits, and the Supreme Court has specifically upheld non-jury OSHA proceedings against a claim that they violate the 7th Amendment.[46] In the same way that in a previous generation, both state and federal governments replaced a system of private lawsuits in courts over workplace injuries with a comprehensive administrative schemes of workers compensation laws,[47] a comprehensive administrative scheme could be designed today for re-adjusting remedies for those suffering injuries during medical treatment, or from defective products or exposure to toxic substances such as asbestos, to replace litigation before traditional courts. For example, Common Good has proposed a system of administrative "health courts" at either the state or federal level.[48] While not entirely free from doubt, federal administrative tribunals to adjudicate medical malpractice cases would probably be constitutional (at least if one assumes that Congress has the right under the Commerce Clause to regulate medical malpractice litigation because its involves economic activity that is "in" and "affects" interstate commerce, an independent issue of some complexity which is outside the scope of this paper[49]).

Assuming that Congress has the power to regulate medical malpractice litigation under the Commerce Clause, Congress could probably replace litigation before traditional courts and lay juries with a comprehensive administrative system for dealing with medical injuries, including expert administrative tribunals without juries. It should be emphasized, however, that the result would be heavily dependent upon the specific provisions of a particular statutory scheme, including whether it was a comprehensive package of reforms of the medical care delivery safety system and whether it included benefits for injured parties as well as defendants.

There are two separate federal constitutional issues that would be raised by assigning malpractice claims to an administrative agency (or to a specialized Article I court, which would raise essentially the same constitutional issues): (1) an argument that the statute impermissibly assigns a "judicial" function to a tribunal that does not comply with Article III requirements, Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50 (1982), and (2) an argument that the administrative tribunals violate 7th Amendment rights to a jury trial. Atlas Roofing Co., Inc. v. OSHA, 430 U.S. (1977).

[49] The power of the federal government to legislate under the Commerce Clause on subjects such as medical malpractice is no longer as clear as it seemed only a few years ago. United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549 (1995); United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598 (2000). In Morrison, the Court invalidated a federal criminal statute punishing violence against women. Even though conceding that there was evidence that violence against women did have an effect on commerce, the Court nonetheless held that what it characterized as an "incidental effect" on commerce does not justify the federal government in regulating areas that have "traditionally" been regulated by the states. On the other hand, the recent "medical marijuana" case would seem to support federal legislation to regulate the safety of medical care, in part because it is economic activity. Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U. S. -- (No. 03–1454 June 6, 2005).

In the modern analysis, both questions turn on whether the Supreme Court would characterize the reforms as involving "public" or "private" rights. An early case, Crowell v. Benson, 285 U.S. 22 (1932), held that "private rights" "that is, of the liability of one individual to another under the law as defined" must be reserved to Article III courts. Although never over-ruled, subsequent cases have significantly eroded the bright-line, conceptual test for "private rights" seemingly laid down in Crowell. In the Supreme Court's most recent venture into the thicket of distinguishing "private" and "public" rights, the Court wrote:

> "whether the 7th Amendment confers .. a right to a jury trial in the face of Congress's decision to assign adjudication of that action to a non-Article III tribunal [turns on the public/private rights distinction]. Congress may only deny trials by jury in actions at law ... in cases where 'public rights' are litigated. ... [t]he federal Government need not be a party for a case to revolve around public rights. The crucial question ... is whether Congress ... has created a seemingly 'private' right that is so closely integrated into a public regulatory scheme as to be a matter appropriate for agency resolution with limited involvement by the Article III judiciary." Granfinanciera SA v. Paul C. Nordberg, Creditor Trustee, 492 U.S. 33 (1989)(emphasis supplied).

Another recent case opined that the issue is not so much whether the affected rights are conceptualized as "private" or "public," but rather whether the re-assignment of certain categories of cases to administrative tribunals would undermine the traditional role of the federal courts in our scheme of government.[50] It seems unlikely that many federal judges view hearing medical malpractice cases under their diversity jurisdiction as central to preserving the role of the federal courts in our constitutional order.

Perhaps the decision that is most analogous to medical malpractice is Thomas v. Union Carbide Agricultural Prod. Co., 473 U.S. 568 (1985). There as part of a comprehensive re-working of the federal pesticide law (FIFRA), Congress provided for "me too" registrations of pesticides based on private test data developed by other manufacturers and set up a scheme of compulsory arbitration by the EPA of the value of data. Union Carbide sued, claiming that its right to sue under state law for violations of its common law trade secrets was a prototypical "private right" that could not be re-assigned to an administrative scheme under Crowell. The Supreme Court rejected the claim in an opinion by Justice O'Connor (also the author of Schor, supra):

[50] Commodity Futures Trading Comm. v. Schor, 478 U.S. 833 (1986)("the congressional scheme does not impermissibly intrude on the province of the judiciary" because "limited CFTC jurisdiction over a narrow class of common law claims as an incident of CFTC's primary and unchallenged adjudicative function does not create a substantial threat to the separation of powers.")

> "[T]he right created by FIFRA is not a purely 'private' right, but bears many of the characteristics of a 'public' right. Use of a registrant's data to support a follow-on registration serves a public purpose as in integral part of a program safeguarding public health. Congress has the power, under Article I, to authorize an agency administering a complex regulatory scheme to allocate costs and benefits among voluntary participants in the program without providing an Article III adjudication."

Like the state law claim for violation of trade secrets at issue in Thomas, medical malpractice claims should not be viewed in isolation, but rather as part of a comprehensive and intertwined system for funding medical care and regulating patient safety.

To be sure, the examples of formerly-private common law rights that have re-assigned to administrative tribunals without juries in Schor and Thomas are much narrower than reform of medical malpractice law. Moreover, participation in both of the regulatory programs upheld in Schor and Thomas was arguably "voluntary." Certainly the case for the constitutionality of administrative "health courts" would be stronger if patients were given the option of opting into a voluntary pilot program which included an administrative system for processing medical injury claims as well as other features.

Many traditionalists will assert that tort claims for medical malpractice are prototypical "private rights" that have historically been assigned to courts and juries and cannot be changed under Crowell. However, a statutory scheme that creates federal administrative tribunals for adjudicating medical malpractice claims would be probably upheld if the administrative tribunals were part of a comprehensive regulatory scheme for reforming the medical care system, particularly if the system were limited at least initially to Medicare or Medicaid recipients where the federal interest in reform is strongest. The system would also be more likely to be upheld if it were part of a comprehensive package of reforms including other measures to improve the quality and safety of the medical care delivery system, such as enhanced disclosure, and "experienced-based" mechanisms to monitor and improve patient safety.

Similarly, while the constitutionality of substituting a federal trust fund administered in part through administrative rulemaking for case-by-case litigation of asbestos cases in state courts is also not entirely free from doubt, if the system is enacted, most of it will also probably be upheld.

It seems unlikely that today's Supreme Court believes that the "traditional role of the federal courts in our scheme of government" (to quote the test from Schor, supra) is to adjudicate private claims for damages between individuals. While these claims were admittedly once conceived as prototypical "private rights" to which Crowell applied and forever guaranteed a judicial forum, the public policy consequences are increasingly apparent to litigation which has a major effect of regulating important economic activity. The power of government to regulate has typically followed from the perception that an activity that was formerly thought of solely private has important externalities or public consequences.[51] Mass torts and medical malpractice litigation are no different, and ultimately Congress will not be found to lack power to address the problems of frivolous litigation any more than it has lacked the power to deal with other serious economic and social problems in the past.

VI.

It is regrettable that most American lawyers are either "court people" or 'agency people" but not both. The American "civil justice system" actually consists of both courts and administrative tribunals and it is important to bring both sets of tools to bear as we consider strategies for civil justice reform. This paper has argued that there are distinctive advantages to administrative as opposed to judicial tribunals for developing and applying consistent and intelligent standards of care.

DRAFT 5: NOT FOR PUBLICATION

The Forgotten Goal of Civil Justice: A Foundation for Common Sense in Daily Life

by Philip K. Howard

The debate over civil justice in recent decades has focused on its fairness. Tort reformers complain of "lawsuit abuse" and "judicial hell-holes."[1] Defenders of the current system talk of the need to protect the little guy against corporate abuses, and extol the jury system as "Democracy in Action."[2]

In this paper I argue that civil justice has a broader goal than fairness: to provide a foundation for reasonable choices in a free society. The main defect in the current system is not that juries are unfair or that there is an avalanche of litigation -- about which there is sharp disagreement[3] -- but that law does not offer predictable guidelines of who can sue for what. The system of justice offers recourse not only against abusive and negligent conduct, but also against conduct that most people consider reasonable. Civil justice tolerates, and arguably encourages, inconsistent verdicts for similar disputes. The law offers few guidelines on standards of care or on the potential exposure when there is a dispute.

Civil justice has changed markedly in the last 40 years.[4] These changes can be traced in part to a shift in judicial philosophy: whatever authority judges believed they held withered with the rise of the "legal process" movement in the 1960s, in which their role was reconceived as one of a neutral referee.[5] The effect was not to achieve neutrality, however, but to leave a vacuum. That vacuum has been filled by an ever-broadening range of private legal claims and threats, giving rise to a lawsuit culture in which ordinary interaction is now weighed down by legal considerations.

The main harm to society is not the total cost of verdicts, but that Americans no longer feel free to act reasonably. Legal fear has infected the culture. Paranoid doctors focus on avoiding lawsuits.[6] Recreational activities are cancelled.[7] Teachers have trouble maintaining

The solution I propose is not to set arbitrary limits on lawsuits but to shift responsibility back to judges to decide, as a matter of law, the boundaries of reasonable claims. To re-instill the public trust in civil justice, judges need to provide people with a sense of who can sue for what.

The authority of judges to assert social norms, although rarely discussed today, is well-established in common law jurisprudence, and was the central theme of those we hold up as lions of the common law, such as Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. and Benjamin Cardozo. [11]

The question of what should be decided by a judge versus a jury, in truth, did not matter much until recent decades. Under prevailing social mores, it didn't occur to people to sue for ordinary accidents or workplace disagreements. But now that perception has radically changed: any disagreement or accident is a potential lawsuit.

The need to reassert judicial authority is not a matter of abstract preference for a particular judicial philosophy. The need to reassert judicial authority is profoundly practical: Because Americans no longer trust civil justice, they have lost their freedom to make reasonable daily choices.

"What really matters is this, that the judge is under a duty... to maintain a relation between law and morals, between the precepts of jurisprudence and those of reason and good conscience."

Civil Justice as the Foundation for Reasonable Choices

Civil justice is conceived today primarily as a dispute resolution mechanism. But civil justice also has a broader goal -- as the foundation for reasonable choices in a free society. Holmes stated that, "the first requirement of a sound body of law" is to uphold reasonable community norms. [12]

Derek Bok, former Harvard President and Law School Dean, observed that lawsuits "often have their greatest effect on people who are neither parties to the litigation nor even aware that it is going on." [13] The news last year that someone received a large verdict in a sledding accident had the natural effect of causing other towns to declare that they no would no longer permit winter sports on town property. [14] No court, however, made a ruling that sledding is an unreasonable risk. Who is representing the interests of the citizens who want to enjoy winter sports?

Law is considered the foundation of a free society not because it seeks to maximize possible legal claims -- as one observer noted, "America did not sue its way to greatness" [15] -- but because it sets forth legal guideposts defining the scope of our freedom. People feel free to interact reasonably with others because the system of law will put criminals in jail, enforce contracts by their terms, and require a negligent person to compensate the person injured. Civil law protects the good as well as prosecutes the bad: citizens in a free society should be confident that if they act reasonably, their freedom to do so will be defended. As long as you act within those guideposts, you are free: free to follow your instincts simply because you choose to.[16] "The end of law," John Locke said, "is not to abolish or restrain, but to preserve freedom."[17]

Today, at least in areas such as tort law, America's civil justice system is not providing these guideposts of right and wrong. There exists a widespread perception, generally accurate, that any injured or angry person can haul another person into court over any accident or disagreement and put that claim to a jury. There is also a perception that the amounts for which people may sue, if not unlimited, are subject to amorphous guidelines and few limits.

Current legal orthodoxy is that the availability of a lawsuit encourages people to act reasonably. Indeed, by making people potentially liable for their negligence, law provides incentives for reasonable conduct. What people seem to have forgotten is that the converse is [16] Prosser and Keeton note that an essential aspect of freedom is being free from "restraint and ...undue consideration for the interests and claims of others." See Prosser and Keeton, supra:

> Individuals have many interests for which they claim protection from the law, and which the law will recognize as worthy of protection...Individuals wish to be secure in their persons against harm and interference, not only as to their physical integrity, but as to their freedom to move about and their peace of mind. They want food and clothing, homes and land and goods, money, automobiles and entertainment, and they want to be secure and free from disturbance in the right to have these things, or to acquire them if they can. They want freedom to work and deal with others, and protection against interference with their private lives, their family relations, and their honor and reputation. They are concerned with freedom of thought and action, with opportunities for economic gain, and with pleasant and advantageous relations with others. The catalogue of their interests might be as long as the list of legitimate human desires; and not the least of them is the desire to do what they please without restraint and without undue consideration for the interests and claims of others.

also true: Allow lawsuits against reasonable behavior and pretty soon people no longer feel free to act reasonably.

An "open season" conception of justice has enormous appeal if people are thinking of getting back at others or looking for comfort in blaming others, but it also has infected daily interaction in society with distrust. People understand, as Professor Robert Kagan observed, that easy justice "can be used against the trustworthy, too. An equal opportunity weapon, it can be invoked by the misguided, the mendacious, and the malevolent, as well as by the mistreated."[18]

The ultimate test of a system of justice, Justice Cardozo suggested, is how people feel about it.[19] By that standard, civil justice is not only a failure, but is actively tearing at the fabric of our society.

Distrust of Justice and Social Decline

In almost every area of social interaction, Americans no longer feel free to act reasonably. The effects of this distrust have been the subject of extensive studies in healthcare, which have concluded that the legal system is a prime contributor to the crisis of cost and quality. Doctors and nurses no longer feel comfortable acting on their best judgment or being candid with each other.

- It is the ubiquitous practice of physicians to order tests that they do not believe are medically necessary, driving up the costs of healthcare.[20] In a 2002 Harris Poll,

78% of physicians admitted ordering unnecessary tests and 94% said that other physicians did.[21] A recent survey in Pennsylvania found that 93% reported practicing defensive medicine, and 92% reported ordering unneeded tests and diagnostic procedures and making unnecessary referrals.[22] Defenders of this practice say that more tests mean better healthcare, but 45 million Americans lack health insurance in part because individuals and small businesses cannot afford healthcare premiums that have skyrocketed.[23]

- The Institute of Medicine has concluded that "patient safety is also hindered through the liability system and the threat of malpractice."[24] Doctors are scared to be candid with each other, leading to unnecessary and often tragic errors. They avoid using e-mail because it leaves a written record. They are reluctant to admit fault even in cases of near misses, where no harm is done to the patient.

U.S. spending per person is "just over" double that of persons in Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United Kingdom.The United States spends a greater percent of gross domestic product on health care than any other major industrialized nation. American healthcare now costs almost twice as much as that in other Western countries. In 2001, the United States spent 14.1 percent of the GDP on health care. This translates to $1.4 trillion, up 8.7 percent from 2000. - The legal system makes it difficult to hold bad doctors accountable. Doctors who make mistakes can drag out litigation for years, often compelling an unfair settlement. Inept doctors often successfully avoid efforts to revoke their licenses by hiring a lawyer and threatening to sue for defamation.

Distrust of the legal system has transformed public schools. Teachers struggle to maintain order in the classroom because they face threats of being dragged into hearings. The degradation of the school culture, as described by Prof. Richard Arum in his book, Judging School Discipline, is linked to requirements to "prove" the correctness of decisions in an adversarial proceeding.[25] The disrespect accorded teachers is shocking. Polls and focus groups show that educators will do almost anything to avoid the unpleasantness of legal hearings. In America today, teachers will not put an arm around a crying child for fear of being sued for an unwanted sexual touching.

Recreation has been transformed. Playgrounds have been stripped of anything athletic—for example, jungle gyms and seesaws. Playgrounds are so boring, according to some experts, that no child over the age of four wants to go in them. [26] I was on a panel convened by Forty years ago, JFK's President's Council on Youth Fitness, with the same goal, called for installing monkey bars and other athletic equipment in playgrounds. Now, because of fear of liability, they've largely been ripped out.

Many other ordinary aspects of growing-up have disappeared. Lakes were closed to swimming as the word got out that you might get sued. Field trips are cancelled.[27] 'Recently, a school in Brooklyn had their beach day near Coney Island—the children were prohibited from going in the water for fear that someone might be liable if there were an accident.[28] A new book, Last Child in the Woods, addresses the cost to society when children lose the experience of spontaneous play and exploration.[29]

Business life has been transformed in many ways. "Foreign businessmen express amazement," Derek Bok observed, at "a system that exposes the entrepreneur to legal challenge so easily and on so many fronts, a system that lends itself so readily to harassment, obstruction, and delay." It is the regular practice of firms, including my own law firm, not to give references for fear of liability. Last year, a nurse admitted to killing 42 people in a string of hospitals in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. He was recognized as a troubled and ineffective nurse and would soon be fired, but would get rehired at another hospital because no one would give him a bad reference. As one hospital administrator admitted, "we're prevented from telling one another what we know out of fear, quite frankly, of being sued."[30]

Symptoms of the distrust of justice are all around us. Warning labels are found on virtually every product. Billions of coffee cups contain the helpful legend "Caution: Contents are Hot." A recent winner of the annual "wacky warning" contest was a 5-inch fishing lure with the following legend: "Harmful if Swallowed."[31] The warnings cost little or nothing, apologists say. But that's not correct either. When every product has a warning, the effect is a version of the child crying wolf -- consumers are less likely to pay attention to the warnings that really matter.

In almost all areas of social interaction -- hospitals, schools, recreation, child-rearing activities, even churches and synagogues -- Americans no longer feel comfortable acting on their reasonable judgment. The reason, polls confirm, is distrust of American Justice. A new Harris Poll, commissioned for this conference, found the following:

- 76% of Americans strongly or somewhat agree that people have become so fearful of frivolous lawsuits that they are discouraged from performing normal activities. [32]
- 83% of Americans strongly or somewhat agree that the system of justice makes it too easy to make invalid claims. [33]

— 94% strongly or somewhat agree that there is a tendency for people to threaten legal action when something goes wrong.[34]

The lack of confidence in civil justice is echoed in numerous other polls.[36]

Defenders of our system of justice say that Americans are irrational, and that the crisis has been manufactured (i) by irresponsible media that makes headlines of occasional rogue jury verdicts and (ii) by a calculated scare campaign of tort reformers. It's correct that the media emphasizes anything that might shock or titillate the public.[37] This bad habit has been observed in the media since colonial days, and, in the land of the First Amendment, it is hard to know what to do about it. It is correct also that reformers have gone of the stump to tell the public that the litigation system is unfair.[38] Probably the biggest promoters of "jackpot justice," however, are

One need only look through the Yellow Pages, or look at billboards, or listen to AM radio, to be barraged by lawyer advertisements encouraging Americans to believe that they can sue for anything.[39] The unavoidable message of those ads is that you might be on the receiving end of one of those lawsuits.

The data on the amount of litigation and the trend in verdicts are notoriously unreliable because fewer than 3% of all cases ever get resolved at trial, and the overwhelming number of claims are settled or disposed of in some other way.[40] Legal threats don't show up in the numbers at all. The best data appear to confirm that the amounts awarded by juries have increased and that the number of claims—at least of certain types— is also up.[41]

As a matter of probabilities, however, the odds of being sued and then losing before a jury are remote for most Americans.[42] Studies also indicate that, in most cases, juries tend to do a reasonable job.[43] But there is contrary evidence –in tragic circumstances, such as a child injured in an accident or a baby born with birth defects, studies show that juries tend to award huge sums irrespective of fault.[44] awards tend to be highly variable from year to year, making it difficult to distinguish trends over relatively short periods of time. We use the longest time series of data on jury verdicts ever assembled: 40 years of data on tort cases in San Francisco County, CA and Cook County, IL collected by the RAND Institute for Civil Justice. We find that while there has been a substantial increase in the average award amount in real dollars, much of this trend is explained by changes in the mix of cases, particularly a decreasing fraction of automobile cases and an increase in medical malpractice. Claimed economic losses, in particular claimed medical losses, also explain a great deal of the increase. Although there appears to be some unexplained growth in awards for certain types of cases, this growth is cancelled out on average by declines in awards in other types of cases); On medical malpractice specifically, see Physician Insurers Association of America, PIAA Claim Trend Analysis: 2003 ed. (2004), cited in American Medical Association, "Medical Liability Reform—NOW," June 14, 2005, available at http://www.ama-assn.org/ama1/pub/upload/mm/-1/mlrnowjune142005.pdf (The median medical liability jury award in medical liability cases nearly doubled from 1997 to 2003, increasing from $157,000 to $300,000. The average award increased from $347,134 in 1997 to $430,727 in 2002. The growth in settlements has mirrored that of jury awards. Arguing about probabilities of being sued does not take into account the reality of human nature. To feel free to act on their reasonable judgment, people seem to need clarity[45] -- for example, that the system of justice will affirmatively protect them if a baseless claim is brought. In the face of uncertainty, individuals often give disproportionate weight to risk—Nobel laureate Daniel Kahneman famously explained this phenomenon as the "overweighting of low probabilities," which helps explain why people think about sharks before swimming in the ocean, even though chances of being attacked are negligible.[46]

Being sued also is also an unlikely but horrifying event, and there are many more potential plaintiffs in our daily lives than there are sharks. Many doctors say that they view every patient as a potential plaintiff. Nothing could be easier, when something goes wrong, than to come up with a theory of what someone might have done differently. Once people learn that someone was exposed to a lawsuit for some ordinary life activity, that activity becomes a risk to avoid.[47] I could find no court that held that a seesaw was unreasonably dangerous, or that putting suntan lotion on children at camp would subject you to liability, but those are endangered

The debate over "tort reform" in the last two decades has focused not on the effectiveness of justice as the foundation for reasonable daily choices, but whether civil justice achieves fairness in particular cases.[49] As Derek Bok noted 20 years ago, there is a tendency to concentrate on the "plight of individual litigants and ignore the effects on the system as a whole."[50]

Tort reformers talk about the "lawsuit lottery," and point to jurisdictions that are notoriously tilted toward claimants and characterize them as "judicial hell-holes" and "magic jurisdictions" where plaintiffs' lawyers can bring baseless or excessive claims with a high probability of success.[51] The focus throughout is fairness. "Is it fair to get a couple of million

[49] Those engaged in the current tort reform debate would do well to heed Geoffrey Hazard's advice that "In all law reform it is important to be circumspect about the nature and magnitude of the problems to which reform is to be addressed." Geoffrey C. Hazard, Jr., Individual Justice in a Bureaucratic World, 7 TUL. J. INT'L & COMP. L. 73 (1999). To properly tackle the problems in the current system, it is important to take a broader view of the effect of civil justice on society.

dollars from a restaurant because you spilled a cup of hot coffee on yourself?"[52] As the Chamber of Commerce asks on its website, "How fair are your courts?"[53]

Actual reform proposals have not questioned the basic functioning of the system, however. As Professor Robert Kagan put it, tort reform has only "nibbled at the edges."[54] Indeed, many tort reformers have gone out of their way to suggest that the problem can be fixed with a few tweaks: "all it takes is a few of those magic jurisdictions to distort the whole system,"[55] said a representative of the National Association of Manufacturers. "A minor change in procedures—the class action bill now pending before Congress—can make that impossible by driving those kinds of mass claims into federal court."[56] (That legislation—the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005—was passed earlier this year.)

The medical profession has thrown its energy into an effort to "cap" non-economic damages at $250,000. If ever enacted, this would certainly moderate malpractice insurance premiums. But most doctors acknowledge that "caps" do little to alleviate the extreme distrust that doctors harbor towards the system. For example, limiting damages awarded for pain and suffering is of little help to an obstetrician who could not have caused a baby's birth defects but is nonetheless found liable for millions of dollars of "economic" damages representing a lifetime of care.[57]

Where tort reformers see the system as rigged by trial lawyers, opponents of reform portray tort reformers as special interests trying to rig the system their way. Joanne Doroshow, a founder of the Center for Justice and Democracy, put it this way: "there has been an increase in efforts to eviscerate the civil justice system and make sure corporations do not get sued for anything they do wrong." [58]

Opponents of tort reform also focus on fairness, which they define as the right to have every case decided by a jury. Robert S. Peck, the head of the Center for Constitutional Litigation, extols the virtues of modern civil justice this way:

> There, an individual, neither wealthy nor well-connected, can haul a huge multinational conglomerate into court and hold it accountable for its wrongful and harmful actions.[59]

"I trust the jury system and I trust the American people and their common sense," as trial lawyer Richard Scruggs put it, "far more than the National Association of Manufacturers to protect the American public."[60]

[60] Wallstreet Week with Fortune, Scruggs/Baroody Debate, aired Jan. 28, 2005, available at http://www.pbs.org/wsw/tvprogram/20050128.html. The populist rhetoric by trial lawyers about "trusting the American people" doesn't seem quite accurate. As Walter Olson recounts in detail in "The Rule of Lawyers" (Truman Talley/St. Martin's 2003) jury selection is a highly manipulated process (by lawyers for both sides). Manuals explain that Mexican Americans are "passive" and "Orientals tend to go along with the majority." Lawyers use focus groups to figure out which juries would be most sympathetic to their arguments. In the silicone breast implant cases, for example, they discovered that blue collar men would be most likely to return verdicts for the plaintiffs. cite.

The impact of justice on the workings of a society is only touched on tangentially. Plaintiffs' lawyers often assert that lawsuits serve a "regulatory function," but when the results vary from case to case, it's hard to find the regulatory rule.[61]

The focus on fairness has proved unproductive on many levels. In any given case, the question of fairness can easily be argued either way. Take the McDonald's hot coffee case, the poster child of "lawsuit abuse." There, an elderly woman was badly burned when she put her coffee cup between her legs, and it spilled as her daughter drove away from the drive-through window. That's her fault, it's easy to say. On the other hand, McDonald's coffee was brewed 20 degrees hotter than other restaurants. Why should the drive-in window sell coffee that's so hot? Why not, aren't drivers grown up?

Arguing about fairness quickly turns into a version of a playground spat. Tort reformers talk about the need to limit frivolous lawsuits. Who can be against that? Defenders of the system talk about protecting the little guy against corporate wrongdoers. Who can be against that? Any functional system of civil justice, of course, should accomplish both goals: it should reliably get rid of frivolous lawsuits, and it should also effectively protect the little guy against a corporate wrongdoer.

What's missing in the debate is any coherent vision of how a system of justice should accomplish these goals.

The Responsibility of Judges vs. Juries.

Ad questionem facti non respondent judices . . .

---

[61] The trial lawyers seem to assume,,contrary to substantial evidence, that the more exposure to liability, the better people will behave. Cites to health care studies, note __supra.

"Judges do not answer questions of fact..."

...ad questionem juris non respondent juratores.
"...jurors do not answer questions of law."

Sir Edward Coke, Commentary on Littleton 460 (J. H. Thomas ed., 1818).

Just as both sides to the tort reform debate have focused on fairness rather than the broader effects of civil justice on society, so too have they assumed that juries, not judges, have the responsibility of deciding whether conduct constitutes negligence or an unreasonable risk. Under current judicial orthodoxy, judges believe they should lean over backwards to put every case to a jury. One standard often quoted is Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41 (1957) admonishing lower courts not to dismiss any claim unless "it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to recover."[62]

Any effort at legal reform is routinely resisted as trespassing on the constitutional right of trial by jury. But the role of the civil jury is generally misunderstood and, to the public, probably confused with the jury's role in criminal cases. In criminal prosecutions, juries play a critical role as our protection against the abuse of government power. Juries are our defense against state coercion: no one can be convicted to jail unless a jury decides they're guilty. But in a civil case, where citizens can use the justice system as an offensive weapon, the role of the jury depends upon whether the issues should be determined as a matter of law or as a matter of disputed fact.

The Seventh Amendment, which states that the "right of trial by jury shall be preserved," underscores this fact-law distinction. It defines the civil jury right as applying to "suits in common law" and ends by saying that "no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise

reexamined...than according to the rules of the common law."[63] Judges declare the standards of law that affect all of society; juries find disputed facts in the particular case.[64]

While most lawyers assume today that the Seventh Amendment is an automatic pass to the jury, what constituted a "suit at common law" in 1791 was sharply limited. There was no cause of action for negligence, for example, until judges in the 19th century made rulings creating this new cause of action. Some issues -- say, interpretation of a statute -- are clearly law. Others are clearly issues of fact: "credibility determinations, the weighing of evidence and the drawing of legitimate inferences from the facts are jury functions, not those of a judge."[65]

Determining whether someone acted reasonably involves mixed questions of law and fact. Any claim for negligence, for example, usually involves what is reasonable conduct in the circumstances. The almost universal practice in tort cases is to give the claim to the jury. One study found that courts show "extreme vigilance against treading on contested fact issues or mixes questions of law and fact - even arguable ones - reserving them for evidentiary hearings . . . This was especially true in cases applying indeterminate legal standards, such as

[63] U.S. CONST. amend. VII. "In suits in common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law."

reasonableness."[66] Most courts do not even pay attention to the question of what should be decided as a matter of fact or law.

> There has been ... a strong tendency to let all issues go to the jury without discriminating among them. Judges may see this not only as conventional, but also as convenient, because it reduces judicial effort and the risk of reversal.[67]

The general practice of American courts is summed up by a sign that once hung over the federal courtroom door in New Orleans: "No spitting. No summary judgment."[68]

There is a different tradition of civil justice, however, that, at least in tort law, would dramatically increase the responsibility of judges. In this tradition, articulated most notably by Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., the overriding goal of civil justice is to provide guidance and protection to society as a whole. Instead of acting as referees over a neutral process, judges have the obligation to make rulings of law on legal duty and standards of care. Whether seesaws are a reasonable risk would be determined by the judge as a matter of law.

This approach has been largely lost to our generation and, to most, probably seems like heresy. But the jurists that we hold up as our leading common law thinkers considered this an essential responsibility of judges. To Holmes, what constitutes reasonable conduct was a question that required a ruling of law:

> Negligence ... [is] a standard of conduct, a standard we hold the parties bound to know before-hand, and which in theory is always > the same fact and not a matter dependent upon the whim of a particular jury nor the eloquence of the particular advocate.[69]

Benjamin Cardozo devoted his famous lectures in 1923 to the importance of this type of "judicial legislation":

> The judge is under a duty...to maintain a relation between law and morals, between precepts of jurisprudence and those of reason and good conscience. "it is the function of courts to keep doctrines up to date with the mores by continued restatement...This is judicial legislation, and the judge legislates at his peril. Nevertheless, it is the necessity and duty of such legislation that gives to judicial office its highest honor; and no brave and honest judge shirks the duty or fears the peril."[70]

Chief Justice Roger Traynor of the California Supreme Court, a famous liberal innovator -- he created the doctrine of strict liability for manufacturers whose products fail[71] -- emphasized the need for judges to declare rulings even in the simplest accident, and not leave standards to the "oscillating verdicts of juries."[72] When a woman hit her head on an angled ceiling while walking down a staircase, Traynor insisted that the judge determine whether it was an unreasonable hazard; in that case, "the danger is so apparent that visitors could reasonably be expected to notice it."[73]

Judges in tort cases today assume that they lack this power, but they need only look to commercial law to see the philosophy in action. In commercial law, the focus is predictability and efficiency. It is a well-established principle that judges, not juries, have the obligation to interpret standard language of contracts.[74] The Uniform Commercial Code was a legislative effort to achieve consistency.[75] Its core concepts, including ones that look very much like those of tort, including reasonableness, are often decided as a matter of law in situations where the fact patterns are likely to be repeated. America's system of commercial law, generally considered the most consistent and predictable in the world, is the bedrock of America's economic strength.

The Supreme Court in recent years has begun to emphasize the goal of legal consistency. Several important decisions, for example, emphasized the desirability of judges using summary judgment to make rulings as a matter of law. In Celotex v. Caltrett, a wrongful death asbestos case, the court starkly shifted direction from the presumption that summary dismissal should be avoided if there was a "scintilla of evidence."[76] Thus, instances in which juries interpret contracts: "Courts which follow the more traditional approach permit the jury to determine the proper interpretation of a contract only if the judge without the aid of parol evidence deems the contract to be ambiguous and parol evidence is then admitted to clarify the parties' intentions. A wider role is permitted by courts that follow the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. G.W. Thomas Drayage & Rigging Co., approach, which essentially allows the court to hear parol evidence to determine whether the writing is susceptible to more than one interpretation. If the court finds that the writing is susceptible to more than one interpretation, and parol evidence is admitted in the hearing of the jury, the jury is charged with determining the meaning of the writing"); Cf. Richard A. > federal rules as a whole, which are designed "to secure the just, speedy and inexpensive determination of every action." (quoting Fed. Rules Civ. Proc. 1.)[77]

In Markman v. Westview Instruments, Justice Souter explained the importance of consistency in patent cases:

> "...we see the importance of uniformity in the treatment of a given patent as an independent reason to allocate all issues of construction to the court. As we noted in General Elec. Co. v. Wabash Appliance Corp., "[t]he limits of a patent must be known for the protection of the patentee, the encouragement of the inventive genius of others and the assurance that the subject of the patent will be dedicated ultimately to the public."[78]

What discourages economic energy, Justice Souter cautioned, was a legal system that created a "zone of uncertainty:"

> "[A] zone of uncertainty which enterprise and experimentation may enter only at the risk of infringement claims would discourage invention only a little less than unequivocal foreclosure of the field," United Carbon Co. v. Binney & Smith Co., 317 U.S. 228, 236, 63 S.Ct. 165, 170, 87 L.Ed. 232 (1942), and "[t]he public [would] be deprived of rights supposed to belong to it, without being clearly told what it is that limits these rights."" *Merrill v. In Cooper v. Leatherman, the court held that the boundaries of punitive damages should be decided as a matter of law: "Requiring the application of law, rather than a decisionmaker's caprice, does more than simply provide citizens notice of what actions may subject them to punishment; it also helps to assure the uniform general treatment of similarly situated persons that is the essence of law itself."[80]

In State Farm v. Campbell, the Court went further on punitive damages, suggesting clear guidelines so that claims of punitive damages could not be used to extort settlements.[81]

> Elementary notions of fairness enshrined in our constitutional jurisprudence dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment, but also of the severity of the penalty that a State may impose..[82]

In Daubert v. Merrell Dow, the court shifted the responsibility of what constitutes credible expert testimony from jury to judge:

> ...the Rules of Evidence -- especially Rule 702 -- do assign to the trial judge the task of ensuring that an expert's testimony both rests on a reliable foundation and is relevant to the task at hand.[83]

Professor Arthur Miller, in a thorough article on the history of the fact-law distinction, is critical of what he sees as this new trend to make decisions as a matter of law on summary judgment. His main point, it seems, is that judges should not be allowed to draw on their values:

> Judges are human, and their personal sense of whether a plaintiffs' claim seems "implausible" can subconsciously infiltrate even the most careful analysis.[84]

The idea of "result-oriented" decisions based on considerations of policy strikes Professor Miller as basically unlawful because "lower courts may curtail litigants' access to trials - and obviously a jury - through arbitrary, result-oriented, or efficiency-motivated determinants at the pretrial motion stage."[85]

At bottom, Professor Miller trusts juries more than judges. But Holmes and Cardozo did not necessarily think that judges are wiser than juries. Their point is that juries can't make consistent rulings. Juries have no authority make rulings at all. Every case is a blank slate. The idea that juries are "Democracy in Action," a kind of mini-election with decisions made on an ad hoc basis, has populist appeal. But the effect is that civil law offers no predictability or guidance.

It is correct that, in making rulings of law, judges will necessarily have to draw on their sense of community values. Cardozo agreed that a judge can never "eliminate altogether the personal measure of the interpreter," but explained that society can't function without a ruling by someone:

> You may say there is no assurance that judges will interpret the mores of their day more wisely and truly than other men. I am not disposed to deny this, but in my view it is quite beside the point. The point is rather that this power of interpretation must be lodged somewhere...[86]

"The basic moral principle, acknowledged by every legal system we know anything about," Yale Professor Eugene Rostow once observed, "is that similar cases should be decided alike."[87] To accomplish that goal, judges must take the responsibility to draw the boundaries of reasonable lawsuits.

Restoring Reliability to Civil Justice:

Times have changed.

In many ways, the changes have been for the better. The shift in legal philosophy that began in the 1960s opened doors for broad segments of society. In our efforts to avoid abuses of authority, however, we undermined the authority needed to make common choices and to run the institutions of society, including the system of civil justice.

We have created a society obsessed with law. Legal threat, once a rare event in anyone's life, is now commonplace. A recent Public Agency survey found that 78% of middle and high-school teachers in American had been threatened by their students with possible violation of their legal rights.[88] The debate over civil justice cannot take place by putting a magnifying glass over a particular dispute. Arguments about fairness, or homilies about the common sense of juries,[89] do nothing to confront the reality that legal fear has become a defining feature of our culture.

I found again and again that they take their service seriously, and follow the law even when the law is at odds with what they personally believe." John Edwards supra nt. 2, "One suspects that some judges are simply selling the good faith and collective wisdom of juries short." Arthur Miller, supra nt. 67 at 1024.; See e.g., R.R. Co. v. Stout, 84 U.S. 657, 664 (1874).

Other countries are beginning to have a similar problem of legal fear (perhaps influenced by American culture) and are proposing solutions. British Prime Minister Tony Blair recently gave a speech pointing to how fear of possible lawsuits has resulted in counterproductive behavior in England: "something is seriously awry when teachers feel unable to take children on school trips, for fear of being sued" or when a town "remove[d] hanging baskets for fear that they might fall on someone's head, even though no such accident has occurred in the 18 years they had been hanging there."[90]

The problem in the UK occurs not because of erratic juries -- the UK long ago abolished juries in most civil cases[91]-- but because judges are not focusing on the social policy implications of allowing certain claims. In an important decision in 2003, the Appellate Committee of the House of Lords took this issue on, and discussed the responsibility of judges to consider policy when deciding whether to permit claims.[92]

The case before the House of Lords could have been picked from many courts in America. On a hot day in the Cheshire region of England, an 18 year-old named John Tomlinson went for a swim in the lake of a local park.[93] Racing into the water from the beach, he dived too sharply and broke his neck on the sandy bottom. He was paralyzed for life.[94]

Mr. Tomlinson sued the Cheshire County Council for not doing more to protect against the accident. The Council, he discovered, knew about the risk. There were three or four near drownings every year. "No swimming" signs had been posted and widely ignored for over a decade. The popularity of the park—more than 160,000 visitors every year—made effective policing almost impossible. Fearful of liability, the Cheshire Council had decided to close off the lake by dumping mud on the beaches and planting reeds. But before the reeds could be planted Mr. Tomlinson had his accident. The Cheshire Council should have acted sooner, as his lawyer argued, to prevent "luring people into a deathtrap"[95] and to protect against a "siren sound strong enough to turn stout men's hearts."[96] The lower court accepted this argument because the County obviously knew the danger.

The Law Lords took the appeal and ordered the case to be dismissed. The lead opinion by Lord Hoffmann declared that whether a claim should be allowed hinged not just on whether an accident is foreseeable, but "also the social value of the activity which gave rise to the risk."[97] Permitting Mr. Tomlinson's claim, the Law Lords held, means that hundreds of thousands of people would not be able to enjoy the park: "[T]here is an important question of freedom at stake. It is unjust that the harmless recreation of responsible parents and children with buckets and spades on the beaches should be prohibited in order to comply with what is thought to be a legal duty."[98]

[97] Id. at [34].

[98] Id. at [46].

The County's ineffective effort to prevent swimming, instead of establishing negligence, the Lords held, demonstrated how a misguided conception of justice hurts the public. "Does the law require that all trees be cut down," Lord Hobhouse asked, "because some youth may climb them and fall?"[99] Lord Scott added, "Of course there is some risk of accidents.... But that is no reason for imposing a grey and dull safety regime on everyone."[100]

The Tomlinson decision exposes the forgotten goal in American justice. Judges have lost sight of the fact that lawsuits concern not only the particular parties to the dispute, but everyone in society.[101] The mere possibility of a lawsuit changes people's behavior.

Protecting the freedom of everyone in society requires a basic shift in responsibility. Judges must delineate the boundaries of claims that implicate social policy. Judges must act as gatekeepers, as Holmes and Cardozo advocated, giving legal substance to general standards.[102]

[101] In recent years, several state Supreme Courts have emphasized the importance of public policy in making rulings of law in tort cases. In a case involving a mugging on a town beach at night, the California Supreme Court ruled that the town should not be liable because, imposing tort liability "admonishes against any use of the property whatever, thus effectively closing the area." Hayes v. State of California, 11 Cal. 3d. 469, 473 (1974). The California Supreme Court also dismissed a claim that a touch football participant was too rough because "imposition of legal liability for such conduct might well alter fundamentally, the nature of the sport." Knight v. Jewett, 3 Cal. 4th 296, 319 (1992). See generally Stephen D. Sugarman, Judges as Tort Law Unmakers: Recent California Experience with "New" Torts, 49 DEPAUL L. REV. 455, 461 (1999). The New Jersey Supreme Court recently held that an accident involving 2 toddlers at a block party should be dismissed because, otherwise, people would stop having block parties. Commentators note that courts wanting to dismiss negligence claims based on policy often use the language of duty. See Dobbs, The Law of Torts, cite, "When courts say the defendant owed no duty that was relevant on the facts....To cast the issue in terms of duty is to provide another subliminal sugeestion--namely that the decision is to be made by judges rather than juries.": Id at 578.

[102] See Sheldon M. Novick, The Collected Works of Justice Holmes, Vol. 3, Holmes, The Common Law, 1881 at 109-304 (University of Chicago Press 1995) "...when standards of conduct are left to the jury, it is a temporary surrender of a judicial function which may be resumed at any moment in any case when the court feels competent to do so. This shift in responsibility is intended to accomplish two goals. It will spawn a body of legal opinions on standards of care and scope of duty that will begin to establish the contours of reasonable dispute. Most citizens don't eagerly await judicial slip opinions, of course, to learn how to behave. The more immediate benefit will be that the public will know that judges now see it as their job affirmatively to defend reasonable conduct.

The rule of thumb for when a legal ruling is needed should probably be this: if allowing a claim (or defense) to proceed to a jury would affect people not in the courtroom, by chilling their reasonable choices, then the judge should make a ruling of law as to the contours of the claim. Are the risks inherent in a public lake ones that society should take? Avoiding this ruling is not neutral. Not ruling, in effect, is a decision to close the lake. It doesn't matter if the jury finds no liability, because the next jury may feel differently.

Shifting this responsibility to judges to make these rulings does not implicate serious concerns of judicial authority, at least if we accept that judges in civil cases are empowered to make rulings of law based on legal policy considerations. The precedents are numerous and several state supreme courts have begun to limit tort claims on this basis. [103] Nor is there any obvious need for procedural tools other than those that already exist, such as summary judgment.[104]

But it will take years of important judicial rulings, even from the Supreme Court, to effect a change in the way most courts handle cases.[105] The power of inertia is always underestimated, and the Supreme Court has learned many times that doctrinal shift does not necessarily occur because it says it should.

Legislation would send a clearer signal. Prime Minister Blair recently announced that he will propose a new Compensation Bill that will "clarify the existing law on negligence to make clear that there is no liability in negligence for untoward incidents that could not be avoided by taking reasonable care or exercising reasonable skill."[106] Such a bill, Prime Minister Blair proposed, "will send a strong signal and...reduce risk-averse behavior by providing reassurance to those who may be concerned about possible litigation, such as volunteers, teachers and local authorities."[107]

The significance of the proposed legislation in the UK will probably not be to provide clear legislative answers, but to shift the goal of civil justice. [108] Instead of focusing only on fairness and foreseeability in a particular case, judges will likely be called upon to make [105] One example is the recognition by courts of a journalistic privilege akin to those acknowledged for lawyers, doctors, and psychologists. Although the Supreme Court ostensibly rejected such a privilege in Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972), there remains disagreement among lower courts, with some following the dissenting opinions filed in the case (recognizing a privilege) and others following Justice Powell's concurrence (narrow interpretation of the holding, privilege should be recognized in some cases).

rulings, as both Holmes and Lord Hoffmann suggested, based on "considerations of social advantage."[109]

Legislation to restore judicial authority in America could be in the form of a general principle, along the following lines:

> Judges shall take the responsibility of drawing the boundaries of reasonable dispute as a matter of law, applying common law principles and statutory guidelines. In making these rulings, judges should consider the impact of allowing such claims (or defenses) on the conduct of broader society.

Legislation could also address specific areas of crisis. Congress has already introduced a bill to authorize pilot projects for administrative health courts, with hearings in the Senate expected over the summer. [110]

Law is a conservative institution, as it should be. The shift towards judicial responsibility will only occur after leaders of bench and bar, exercising their considerable powers of skepticism, reach their own understanding of why this change is essential. Some of the concerns, however, can be predicted.

All citizens are entitled to their day in court, many will observe. I would go further: the courthouse doors should never be barred, even to frivolous claims. The pertinent question is how far the claim goes, i.e., whether it is subject to dismissal by motion with a legal ruling.[111] What I advocate is not taking away the right to sue, but giving substance to the right to sue. The doctrines developed by judicial rulings will also, of course, be subject to oversight by the legislature.

Conservatives may object that this is "judicial activism." But there is a difference between a judge assuming legislative functions, such as taking control of a school system, and a judge dismissing an unreasonable private claim. A kind of defensive activism, where judges act as gatekeepers, is essential to keep private parties from using justice unilaterally to undermine the freedom of others in society.

The main concern, I suspect, will focus on what is called "the right to sue." The mischief caused by civil justice in the last 40 years has sustained itself so long, in my view, because of a false assumption about the nature of civil justice. Pretty much everyone seems to believe there is a constitutional right to sue for almost everything.

Suing is not an act of freedom, however. The rights of freedom that our founders gave us, such as freedom of speech, were rights against state power. Suing invokes the state's coercive power against another private citizen--if you lose, the marshal may come and take your home away. Suing is just like indicting someone, except that it is an indictment for money. We would never tolerate a prosecutor bringing a baseless charge. Nor would we allow a prosecutor to threaten the death penalty for a misdemeanor.[112] That would be using state power for extortion. Why, then, do we tolerate allowing self-interested private parties to invoke legal power for whatever they want against other free citizens?

[111] Sanctions footnote

An "open season" philosophy of justice does not enhance our constitutional rights. The point of freedom is almost exactly the opposite--that we can live our lives without being cowed by state power. When private parties use the threat of state power for their private benefit, without any moderating judicial authority, justice becomes a tool for extortion.

Holmes famously defined law as "The prophecies of what the courts will do."[113] Today in America, in areas such as tort law, no one has any idea of what a court will do. What that means, I submit, is that in these areas Americans have lost the protection of law. That's why Americans are fearful.

Shifting the responsibility to judges to draw the boundaries of claims is a major doctrinal change, comparable in scope to the shifts that occurred in the 1960s. But a bold change is required to restore public trust, and to revive the authority needed to nurture America's common institutions back to health. Sooner or later, as Derek Bok observed, "our legal system [must] empower someone to keep watch and make sure that the process as a whole is meeting the needs of those whom it purportedly serves."[114]

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE Acting ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL NMG 8/2/06

FROM: Sue Ellen Wooldridge
Assistant Attorney General

SUBJECT: Acceptance of Concurrent Legislative Jurisdiction at Bureau of Prisons Facilities in California

PURPOSE: To obtain the signature of Attorney General Gonzales

TIMETABLE: Review and signature without delay

SYNOPSIS: The Attorney General should accept concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction, on behalf of the United States and from the State of California over the lands comprising the United States Penitentiary at Atwater, the former Federal Prison Camp at Boron, the Metropolitan Detention Center at Los Angeles, the Correctional Institution at Taft, and the Federal Correctional Institution at Mendota. Acceptance of concurrent legislative jurisdiction will allow the Federal Government to enforce certain federal laws that apply only within areas under the United States' legislative jurisdiction, without displacing state enforcement authorities.

DISCUSSION: The Bureau of Prisons (Bureau) desires to renew concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over the site of the United States Penitentiary at Atwater (USP Atwater), the former Federal Prison Camp at Boron (FPC Boron), the Metropolitan Detention Center at Los Angeles (MDC Los Angeles), and the Correctional Institution at Taft (CI Taft), and acquire concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over the site of the Federal Correctional Institution at Mendota (FCI Mendota).

At the Environment Division's request, the State recently renewed cession of concurrent criminal jurisdiction to the United States over the first four sites, and ceded concurrent criminal jurisdiction to the United States over FCI Mendota. Under federal law, these cessions do not take effect until (1) accepted by the Attorney General and (2) the cession documents have been recorded in the County land records where the respective lands are located. This memorandum recommends that the Attorney General accept concurrent legislative jurisdiction on behalf of the United States for the sites.

RECOMMENDATION: I recommend that you sign the enclosed letter to the Chairman of the California State Lands Commission, accepting concurrent criminal jurisdiction for the sites of USP Atwater, FPC Boron, MDC Los Angeles, CI Taft, and FCI Mendota.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Article I, Section 8, Clause 17, of the United States Constitution authorizes the federal government to exercise jurisdiction over lands it acquires within a state. Clause 17 provides: "The Congress shall have power * * * to exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases" over "all Places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be" for forts, docks, and "other needful buildings." This Clause authorizes the United States to exercise either exclusive legislative jurisdiction (displacing state authority) or concurrent legislative jurisdiction (establishing concurrent federal and state authority) over federal property, where state consent has been given. See James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. 134, 148 (1937).

Certain acts violate federal criminal law wherever they are committed and, therefore, are uniformly subject to federal prosecution. However, other acts do not violate federal criminal law unless they are committed in areas within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States, including areas over which the United States has acquired legislative jurisdiction pursuant to Clause 17. See 18 U.S.C. § 7. Laws that apply only in areas of federal legislative jurisdiction include: 18 U.S.C. §§ 81 (arson); 113 (assaults); 114 (maiming); 117 (domestic assault by habitual offender); 661 (theft); 662 (receiving stolen property); 1111 (murder); 1112 (manslaughter); 1113 (attempt to commit murder or manslaughter); 1201 (kidnaping); 1363 (destruction of property); 1801 (video voyeurism); and 2111 (robbery). Where Congress has not specifically criminalized particular conduct, the Assimilative Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. § 13, makes it a federal crime to commit any act that would be punishable under the criminal laws of the relevant state.

The Bureau of Prisons routinely seeks concurrent legislative jurisdiction at federal correctional institutions to ensure that the United States can prosecute conduct, especially inmate conduct, that violates such statutes. The Bureau typically seeks concurrent, rather than exclusive, jurisdiction so that the United States will have a choice whether to prosecute a particular crime or to leave the prosecution to state authorities. State cession of concurrent jurisdiction allows the United States to enforce all federal criminal laws, without displacing state enforcement authorities.

Consent by the state is a prerequisite to the federal government's acquisition of jurisdiction under Article I, Section 8, Clause 17. See James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. at 147, 148. Cession by a state of legislative jurisdiction is not effective until an authorized federal officer accepts the jurisdiction. See 40 U.S.C. § 3112, formerly 40 U.S.C. § 255. Only the U.S. Attorney General is authorized to accept legislative jurisdiction on behalf of the Bureau.

CALIFORNIA'S CESSION OF CONCURRENT LEGISLATIVE JURISDICTION

California law authorizes the California State Lands Commission to cede concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction to the United States for periods not to exceed five years. See Cal. Gov't Code § 126(e). On September 17, 2001, the Commission approved the cession of concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction to the United States over the lands comprising FPC Boron, CI Taft, MDC Los Angeles, and USP Atwater. (These lands are described in Exhibit A to the attached acceptance letter.) On April 17, 2006, the Commission approved the renewed cession of concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over these sites, as well as the cession of concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over the land comprising FCI Mendota.

California law sets certain conditions for the transfer of jurisdiction. Of relevance here, it provides that the State "reserves jurisdiction over the land, water, and use of water with full power to control and regulate the acquisition, use, control, and distribution of water" and that the state "exempts and reserves * * * to the state all deposits of minerals." Cal. Gov't Code §§ 126(g), (h). In the past, the United States has accepted legislative jurisdiction notwithstanding these provisions. Approximately 10 years ago, staff counsel for the California State Lands Commission provided the Department of Justice with a legal analysis of these reservations, based on available legislative history. The Commission's counsel concluded:

> It is my opinion that these [reservations] should be read to apply only to those situations where the State of California has conveyed fee title to the United States. * * * they should not be considered conditions precedent to the transfer of legislative jurisdiction. There is nothing to suggest that the Legislature intended that the United States convey its water rights or mineral estates as a condition for a cession. Nor is there anything to suggest that this is or ever was the Commission's administrative practice.

Letter from James R. Frey to Michael E. Wall (May 3, 1996) (Exhibit B to the attached acceptance letter). The acceptance letter would confirm our understanding that these state-law reservations do not require the United States to convey any water rights or mineral estates as a condition of this cession.

CONCLUSION:

Acceptance of concurrent legislative jurisdiction at the site of five Bureau of Prison sites would allow the United States authority to enforce certain federal laws at these five sites, without displacing state authority.

This matter is time sensitive because federal concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over the lands comprising FPC Boron, CI Taft, MDC Los Angeles, and USP Atwater will lapse in October, 2006, pursuant to the sunset provision in Cal. Gov't Code § 126(e). Should jurisdiction lapse, the United States cannot enforce certain federal laws, including the Assimilative Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. § 13, at the facilities.

Should you have any questions regarding this matter, please have your staff contact Justin Smith, of the Environment & Natural Resources Division's Law and Policy Section, at 514-0750, or George Younger, of the Federal Bureau of Prisons' Office of General Counsel, at 353-4595.

Mr. Steve Westly
Chairman
California State Lands Commission
100 Howe Avenue, Suite 100 South
Sacramento, CA 95825-8202

Dear Chairman Westly:

On April 17, 2006, acting pursuant to Cal. Gov't Code § 126, the California State Lands Commission (Commission) approved the cession of concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction to the United States over the lands comprising the United States Penitentiary at Atwater; the former Federal Prison Camp at Boron; the Metropolitan Detention Center at Los Angeles; the Correctional Institution (also previously known as the Federal Correctional Institution) at Taft; and the Federal Correctional Institution at Mendota.

On behalf of the United States pursuant to 40 U.S.C. § 3112, I accept concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over the specified lands. (See Exhibits A1– A5, attached.) My acceptance shall take effect upon recording of certified copies of the cession documents of the Commission in the office of the county recorder of each county where the lands are situated.

The United States understands that Cal. Gov't Code § 126 does not require the United States to convey any water rights or mineral estate as a condition of this cession. This understanding conforms to the 1996 interpretation of section 126 provided by counsel to the California State Lands Commission.

Please execute the acknowledgment of receipt of this letter in duplicate and return one original to: Justin Smith, United States Department of Justice, Environment & Natural Resources Division, Law and Policy Section, P.O. Box 4390, Washington, D.C. 20044-4390. Should you need any further information, please have your staff contact Mr. Smith at (202) 514-0570.

I appreciate your assistance.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL 8/2/06

FROM: Sue Ellen Wooldridge
Assistant Attorney General

SUBJECT: Acceptance of Concurrent Legislative Jurisdiction at Bureau of Prisons Facility in Devens, Massachusetts

PURPOSE: To obtain the signature of Attorney General Gonzales

TIMETABLE: Review and signature without delay

SYNOPSIS: The Attorney General should accept concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction, on behalf of the United States and from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts over the land comprising the Federal Medical Center Devens. Acceptance of concurrent legislative jurisdiction will allow the Federal Government to enforce certain federal laws that apply only within areas under the United States' legislative jurisdiction, without displacing state enforcement authorities.

DISCUSSION: The Bureau of Prisons (Bureau) desires to acquire concurrent criminal and civil legislative jurisdiction over the site of the Federal Medical Center at Devens (FMC Devens). The Commonwealth recently approved cession of concurrent jurisdiction to the United States over FMC Devens. Under federal law, this cession does not take effect until accepted by the Attorney General.

This memorandum recommends that the Attorney General accept concurrent legislative jurisdiction on behalf of the United States for the site.

RECOMMENDATION: I recommend that you sign the enclosed letter to Governor Romney of Massachusetts, accepting concurrent jurisdiction for the site of FMC Devens.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

Article I, Section 8, Clause 17, of the United States Constitution authorizes the federal government to exercise jurisdiction over lands it acquires within a state. Clause 17 provides: "The Congress shall have power * * * to exercise exclusive Legislation in all Cases" over "all Places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be" for forts, docks, and "other needful buildings." This Clause authorizes the United States to exercise either exclusive legislative jurisdiction (displacing state authority) or concurrent legislative jurisdiction (establishing concurrent federal and state authority) over federal property, where state consent has been given. See James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. 134, 148 (1937).

Certain acts violate federal criminal law wherever they are committed and, therefore, are uniformly subject to federal prosecution. However, other acts do not violate federal criminal law unless they are committed in areas within the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States, including areas over which the United States has acquired legislative jurisdiction pursuant to Clause 17. See 18 U.S.C. § 7. Laws that apply only in areas of federal legislative jurisdiction include: 18 U.S.C. §§ 81 (arson); 113 (assaults); 114 (maiming); 117 (domestic assault by habitual offender); 661 (theft); 662 (receiving stolen property); 1111 (murder); 1112 (manslaughter); 1113 (attempt to commit murder or manslaughter); 1201 (kidnaping); 1363 (destruction of property); 1801 (video voyeurism); and 2111 (robbery). Where Congress has not specifically criminalized particular conduct, the Assimilative Crimes Act, 18 U.S.C. § 13, makes it a federal crime to commit any act that would be punishable under the criminal laws of the relevant state.

The Bureau of Prisons routinely seeks concurrent legislative jurisdiction at federal correctional institutions to ensure that the United States can prosecute conduct, especially inmate conduct, that violates such statutes. The Bureau typically seeks concurrent, rather than exclusive, jurisdiction so that the United States will have a choice whether to prosecute a particular crime or to leave the prosecution to state authorities. State cession of concurrent jurisdiction allows the United States to enforce all federal criminal laws, without displacing state enforcement authorities.

FMC Devens is an administrative facility housing male offenders requiring specialized or long-term medical or mental health care. FMC Devens also has a satellite camp housing minimum security male inmates. The lands comprising FMC Devens were formerly part of Devens Army Base. Administrative control of this portion of the Devens Army Base was transferred by the Army to the Bureau in 1997. The Bureau is now seeking to establish concurrent federal legislative jurisdiction over offenses occurring at FMC Devens, with the concurrence of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. The Criminal Division agrees that federal authorities should have jurisdiction over any offenses committed by inmates at FMC Devens because state and local authorities often decline to address non-federal offenses that occur on the site.

Consent by the state is a prerequisite to the federal government's acquisition of jurisdiction under Article I, Section 8, Clause 17. See James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. at 147, 148. Cession by a state of legislative jurisdiction is not effective until an authorized federal officer accepts the jurisdiction. See 40 U.S.C. § 3112, formerly 40 U.S.C. § 255. Only the U.S. Attorney General is authorized to accept legislative jurisdiction on behalf of the Bureau.

MASSACHUSETTS' CESSION OF CONCURRENT LEGISLATIVE JURISDICTION

The Bureau of Prisons began efforts to acquire concurrent legislative jurisdiction over the land in Harvard, Massachusetts that comprises FMC Fort Devens in 1998. The effort was unusually difficult and lengthy. Massachusetts ultimately ceded concurrent criminal legislative jurisdiction over that land to the United States by an act of the Massachusetts legislature of December 27, 2004. See Chapter 481 of the Acts of 2004. This was subsequently signed into law by the Governor of Massachusetts on January 6, 2005. (These lands are described in Exhibit A to the attached acceptance letter.)

CONCLUSION AND RECOMMENDATION:

Acceptance of concurrent legislative jurisdiction at the FMC Devens site would allow the United States authority to enforce and prosecute certain federal laws, as well as other, non-federal offenses, without displacing state authority.

The Bureau considers it a priority to obtain concurrent jurisdiction over FMC Devens by acceptance at the earliest possible date, to avert the risk that the United States may lack jurisdiction to prosecute offenses that may occur prior to acceptance.

Should you have any questions regarding this matter, please have your staff contact Justin Smith, of the Environment & Natural Resources Division's Law and Policy Section, at 514-0750, or George Younger, of the Federal Bureau of Prisons' Office of General Counsel, at 353-4595.

Washington, D.C.

The Honorable Mitt Romney
Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts
Boston, MA 02133

Dear Governor Romney:

On behalf of the United States, pursuant to 40 U.S.C. § 3112 (formerly 40 U.S.C. § 255), I accept concurrent legislative jurisdiction over the lands described in Exhibit A (formerly part of Devens Army Base and now comprising the Federal Medical Center Devens) from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, as provided in Chapter 481 of the Acts of 2004, approved on January 6, 2005. Administrative control of this federal property was transferred by the Army to the Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Prisons, in 1997.

It is deemed highly desirable and in the interests of sound administration of federal penal institutions that the United States have concurrent jurisdiction over this property. While the Massachusetts session law referred to above cedes such jurisdiction, federal law requires a specific acceptance on behalf of the United States, which this letter provides. See 40 U.S.C. § 3112. This acceptance of cession of concurrent jurisdiction from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to the United States is effective as of the above date.

Please execute the acknowledgment of receipt of this letter in duplicate and return one original to: Justin Smith, United States Department of Justice, Environment and Natural Resources Division, Law and Policy Section, P.O. Box 4390, Washington, DC 22044-4390. Should you need further information, please have your staff contact Mr. Smith at (202) 514-0750.

SUBJECT: Senior Executive Service (SES) Bonus and Pay Adjustment Policy

PURPOSE: To obtain your approval on SES performance bonus and pay adjustment policy and to issue guidance to Components

TIMETABLE: As soon as possible.

DISCUSSION: This is to request your approval to issue SES operating guidance to Component Performance Review Boards (PRB) including the Department's 2006 performance bonus and pay adjustment policy.

In addition, this is to request approval to limit the Department's total performance bonus pool to 7 percent of career SES pay (statutory limitation is 10 percent) and limit the total number of career bonuses to 50 percent of the career executives (the 2005 government-wide average was 66.5 percent versus 53.5 percent for the Department of Justice).

Upon your approval, the Justice Management Division's Personnel Staff will issue implementing guidance which will include bonus and merit-based salary adjustment ranges based on performance rating levels. Lastly, all bonus and pay recommendations will be submitted to you for approval after being reviewed by the Senior Executive Resources Board.

Senior Counsel for Alternative Dispute Resolution

MEMORANDUM

Washington, D.C. 20530

To: Neil M. Gorsuch
Principal Deputy Associate Attorney General
Office of the Associate Attorney General

From: Linda Cinciotta
Senior Counsel for Alternative Dispute Resolution
Office of Dispute Resolution

Subject: Three Guides Developed by the Steering Committee of the Federal Interagency Alternative Dispute Resolution Working Group

Date: May 3, 2006

A. BACKGROUND, QUESTION PRESENTED, AND RECOMMENDATION/DECISION

Background

The Steering Committee of the federal Interagency Alternative Dispute Resolution Working Group (the Steering Committee) developed three new draft guides intended to assist federal agencies in developing procedures, policies, and training in how to use alternative means of dispute resolution. The guides cover the following areas:

- confidentiality protection in federal workplace dispute resolution programs
- ethical considerations for federal employee mediators
- ombuds practice in the federal sector

The draft guides were widely disseminated for public comment. The Steering Committee has considered and disposed of the comments received, and has finalized the guides. The last step is to post the documents on the interagency alternative dispute resolution web site. Because the web site is managed by the Department of Justice/Office of Dispute Resolution, any document posted there is potentially viewed as having the endorsement of the Department.

Before the public comments had been received, you and I felt the primary authors should conduct a briefing for you, along with representatives from the Office of Legislative Affairs and Office of Legal Policy, on the substance of the guides. That briefing would have taken place after the Steering Committee had received, and dealt with, the public comments but before the guides were actually posted. After the public comments had been received and analyzed, you and I revisited the question of a briefing. In view of the paucity of the public comments received, and the fact that the feasible suggestions have been implemented in the final version of the guides, we both felt that a briefing is probably unnecessary. We agreed that I would give you this memo about the process followed, the areas covered by each guide, and the disposition of the public comments.

Question Presented

Do you feel that you need a briefing, or does this memo give you all the information you need to concur in the posting of the guides on the interagency web site?

Recommendation/Your Decision

I recommend that you read this memorandum. The full text of the three guides, as well as summaries of the public comments received and their disposition, are attached for your convenience but I do not think you need to review them. I also do not think you will need a briefing.

Please let me know if you would like a briefing or any further information. If not, I can proceed with the posting of the guides.

B. DISCUSSION

Role of the Attorney General/Department of Justice

Pursuant to the Administrative Dispute Resolution Act of 1996 and the Presidential Memorandum of May 1, 1998, the Attorney General is the head of federal alternative dispute resolution, and is responsible for facilitating and encouraging the use of dispute resolution by agencies throughout the Executive Branch of the federal government. The Office of Dispute Resolution (ODR) discharges this responsibility.

Other federal agencies look to the Department of Justice for leadership and guidance in the area of alternative dispute resolution (ADR). ODR manages an interagency alternative dispute resolution web site (www.adr.gov) which is the primary government-wide source of information on ADR for federal agencies. The web site includes a guidance page that offers resource material for different areas, including confidentiality in ADR, environmental conflict resolution policy, arbitration guidance, federal procurement, and federal court-annexed ADR programs.

Role of the Interagency Alternative Dispute Resolution Steering Committee

ODR represents the Attorney General on the Steering Committee of the federal Interagency Alternative Dispute Resolution Working Group (Steering Committee). The members of the Steering Committee are subject matter experts who are senior alternative dispute resolution professionals representing 32 federal agencies (all of the Cabinet departments and many of the independent agencies). They are responsible for facilitating and encouraging use of alternative dispute resolution in the practices of their respective organizations.

Each of the three guides was written by a sub-group of the Steering Committee that called upon those with knowledge and expertise in the particular area. The draft guides then were considered and approved by the full Steering Committee before they were offered for public comment.

Opportunity for Public Comment on the Draft Guides

Federal Register publication is required only for "rule" documents designed to implement, interpret, or prescribe law or policy. The Steering Committee guides are "notice" documents which offer best practices for agencies to follow but do not require that they do so. Hence, Federal Register publication was not required. Nonetheless, ODR and the Steering Committee decided that a limited publication in the Federal Register, as well as a brief opportunity for public comment, was desirable. A summary notice, inviting public comment within thirty days, was published in the Federal Register on November 9, 2005, and it advised readers that the full text of the three draft guides was available on the interagency ADR web site. (In addition, the same summary notice with invitation for public comment was disseminated through the interagency ADR web site listserv, which has 200 subscribers interested in federal ADR.)

Very few public comments were received. Most of the suggestions received were implemented in the final version of the guides. Virtually all of the suggestions that were not adopted were impractical, infeasible, or beyond the scope of the guide.

The Draft Guides and Disposition of Comments Received

The following discussion summarizes: the areas covered by each of the three draft guides; the comments received on each guide; and the Steering Committee's disposition of those comments. Each of the guides, and the summary of comments received/disposition for each guide, are attached.

- "Protecting the Confidentiality of Dispute Resolution Proceedings: A Guide for Federal Workplace Alternative Dispute Resolution Program Administrators"

  The Document (Attachment A). The Confidentiality Guide provides practical guidance to federal administrators on the application of the confidentiality provisions of the Administrative Dispute Resolution Act of 1996 to federal workplace dispute resolution programs. It describes in practical, non-legal terms the nature and limits of confidentiality in federal alternative dispute resolution proceedings, and provides suggestions to program administrators on how to ensure appropriate confidentiality is maintained when ADR is used in workplace programs. The topics addressed by the Guide include confidentiality during the various stages of an alternative dispute resolution proceeding, confidentiality agreements, record-keeping, program evaluation, access requests, and non-party participants.

Comments and Disposition (Attachment B). Comments were received from two individuals and, following receipt of those public comments, members of the Steering Committee provided limited additional suggestions to further clarify the language and intent of the Guide. Clarifications, a correction, and editorial changes were made to implement most of the changes. A suggestion that the functions of agency program administrators be delineated precisely could not be implemented because those functions vary widely from agency to agency. The other suggestions that could not be implemented pertained to matters beyond the scope of the Guide: initiating an audit into arguably illegal conduct uncovered during the proceeding; provision of legal advice on the enforceability of agreements which increase confidentiality protections beyond those provided by statute; and analysis of the relationship between statutory confidentiality provisions and other laws and regulations that authorize access to, or reporting of, certain classes of information.

- "A Guide for Federal Employee Mediators"

The Document (Attachment C). The Guide for Mediators provides practical ethical guidance for federal employee mediators tailored to mediation practice within the federal government. It builds upon the September 2005 Model Standards of Conduct for Mediators issued by a joint committee of three major nationwide organizations (the American Arbitration Association, the American Bar Association, and the Association for Conflict Resolution) and approved by all three organizations. The Guide sets forth the Model Standards in their entirety and provides further explication through Federal Guidance Notes for federal employee mediators for mediations they undertake for the federal government. The Federal Guidance Notes include discussion of impartiality, conflicts of interest, confidentiality, and advertising and solicitation.

Comments and Disposition (Attachment D). Comments were received from two individuals, raising what each perceived as an ambiguity in a particular provision. Both concerns had merit and appropriate clarifications were made in the guide.

- "A Guide for Federal Employee Ombuds"

The Document (Attachment E). The Guide for Ombuds was developed by the Coalition of Federal Ombudsmen in conjunction with the Steering Committee. It builds upon the Standards for the Establishment and Operations of Ombuds Offices issued on February 9, 2004, by the American Bar Association. The Guide sets forth the Ombuds Standards in their entirety and provides supplementation through Federal Guidance Notes for specific areas unique to federal Ombuds practice. The Federal Guidance Notes include discussion of limitations on ombuds' authority, confidentiality, reporting, and record keeping.

Comments and Disposition (Attachment F). Comments were received from four sources. The first source is an individual who suggested editorial changes in the American Bar Association Standards, but the Steering Committee is without authority to change standards promulgated by another entity. Two individuals submitted joint comments suggesting clarification and/or elaboration in five areas. The relevant portions of the guide were revised to incorporate their suggestions. A federal agency submitted suggestions in five areas, and they were implemented with one exception. The exception related to implied notice and appeared to construe a constraint too narrowly. In any event, the implied notice provision was clarified in accordance with other comments submitted.

Final Step: Publication of the Guides As Final Documents

The Steering Committee is ready to publish the guides, as final documents, on the interagency web site. Each guide will be accompanied by a separate document which explains in detail each public comment received and the disposition of each comment in the final guide. In addition, ODR will publish a brief notice in the Federal Register which notes that the final guides, and summary of the disposition of the public comments on them, are posted on the interagency web site. (In addition, the same brief notice about the posting of the final guides and disposition of comments received will be disseminated through the interagency ADR web site listserv.)

Since we manage the interagency web site, the guides will be potentially viewed as having the endorsement of ODR/Department of Justice. The Office of the Associate Attorney General (Elizabeth Kessler, Deputy Associate Attorney General) reviewed the draft guides before they were offered for public comment and had no concerns or suggested changes. In view of the fact that the draft guides were widely disseminated for public comment, and that virtually all of the suggested changes were implemented, ODR does not believe publication of the guides will generate any controversy or problem. Nonetheless, ODR wanted the Office of the Associate Attorney General to have the opportunity to review the final version of the guides if desired before posting on the web site.

Dear Ms. Merriman:

Thank you for sending to the Department of Justice a copy of Resolution P/288/06. We appreciate knowing of your concerns regarding gasoline prices.

Like you, the United States Department of Justice is concerned about the adverse consumer impact of the increasing prices for gasoline and other refined petroleum products. Given the importance of energy to Americans' everyday lives and to the American economy, we have substantially increased our efforts to monitor, detect, pursue, and prevent violations of law in this industry. The Attorney General and Federal Trade Commission (FTC) Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras have written to the state attorneys general expressing concern about the adverse impact of increasing gasoline prices on American consumers and encouraging the states to work with us to ensure that appropriate enforcement action is taken against unlawful conduct resulting in artificial price spikes. Recently, the Attorney General and Chairman Majoras met with state attorneys general and their representatives to further this effort.

The Department shares civil antitrust enforcement authority with the FTC. The FTC has primary responsibility for investigating possible non-criminal antitrust violations in oil and gasoline markets. However, the Department has sole authority for criminal antitrust enforcement against hard-core violations such as price-fixing in all markets, including oil and gasoline.

At the President's directive, the Department and the FTC are undertaking a special inquiry to ensure that all evidence of potential anticompetitive conduct is carefully examined. We are coordinating our efforts with the FTC and with state attorneys general as appropriate. You may be assured that if any evidence of criminal conduct is uncovered, the Department will pursue it and take whatever enforcement action is warranted.

Thank you again for bringing your concerns to our attention. We have also forwarded a copy of Resolution P/288/06 to the FTC.

Sincerely,

Crystal R. Jezierski

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL 8/4/06

FROM: Lee J. Lofthus
Acting Assistant Attorney General
for Administration

SUBJECT: Proposed Reorganization of the Office of Justice Programs

PURPOSE: The Office of Justice Programs (OJP) is proposing to put into place a new organizational structure that will foster operational and managerial efficiencies and provide for enhanced accountability. OJP's proposal is responsive to recently-enacted legislative provisions addressing improved oversight of OJP grants, including establishment of an Office of Audit, Assessment, and Management to carry out and coordinate program assessments and ensure compliance with grant conditions. By implementing these specific changes, as well as those summarized below and on the attached document, this reorganization will improve OJP's overall responsiveness to the criminal justice field, states, localities, tribes, the general public, and the Congress.

TIMETABLE: The Assistant Attorney General, OJP, has requested a decision be made as soon as possible.

SYNOPSIS: The reorganization will: (1) expand the Program Review Office currently within the Office of the Assistant Attorney General and transform it into an Office of Audit, Assessment, and Management; (2) consolidate the functions and personnel of the Office of the Comptroller and the Office of Budget and Management Service and establish a new Office of the Chief Financial Officer (OCFO); (3) realign the current Office of Administration and show it on the organization chart; (4) eliminate the Office of Management and Administration from the organization chart; (5) realign the Equal Employment Opportunity Office to report to the Office of the Assistant Attorney General; (6) eliminate the Office of Weed and Seed from the organization chart and realign its functions within the Community Capacity Development Office (CCDO); (7) eliminate the American Indian and Alaskan Native Desk from the organization chart and realign its functions within the CCDO; (8) eliminate the Office of the Police Corps and Law Enforcement Education from the organization chart and realign its remaining functions within the Bureau of Justice Assistance; and (9) change the name of the box entitled Chief Information Officer to the Office of the Chief Information Officer.

DISCUSSION: These changes, described in more detailed in the attached document, will transform OJP into an organization that is more streamlined and responsive to the customer, and that has an enhanced ability to respond to internal and external stakeholders' needs. These outcomes will be accomplished by streamlining OJP's program and administrative functions, eliminating structures with overlapping missions, programs and functions, and centralizing and simplifying lines of authority and accountability. For example, the establishment of the OCFO will consolidate and centralize budgetary and financial functions. This reorganization will fulfill several strategic goals that were identified in a 2001 report to Congress. It will enable OJP to become an even more efficient organization.

It has been determined that Office of Management and Budget (OMB) and Congressional notification will be required prior to implementing these changes. I will initiate these actions upon your approval of the reorganization. This reorganization will not require a budgetary reprogramming.

RECOMMENDATION: Signature on the attached organizational chart and memorandum to the Assistant Attorney General, OJP, approving the reorganization, contingent on review and approval by OMB and Congress.

MEMORANDUM FOR ALBERTO R. GONZALES
Attorney General

Re: Proposed Reorganization of the Office of Justice Programs

ACTION MEMORANDUM

The attached proposed organization chart and memorandum were prepared by the Justice Management Division, and forwarded by the Acting Assistant Attorney General for Administration to this Office for review with respect to form and legality.

The proposal would establish a new organizational structure for the Office of Justice Programs (OJP) to improve operational and managerial efficiency and provide for enhanced accountability. In particular, the most significant parts of the proposal would (1) expand the Program Review Office currently within the Office of the Assistant Attorney General and transform it into an Office of Audit, Assessment, and Management; (2) consolidate the functions and personnel of the Office of the Comptroller and the Office of Budget and Management Service and establish a new Office of the Chief Financial Officer; (3) realign the current Office of Administration and show it on the organization chart; (4) realign the Equal Employment Opportunity Office to report to the Office of the Assistant Attorney General; (5) eliminate the Office of Weed and Seed from the organization chart and realign its functions within the Community Capacity Development Office (CCDO); (6) eliminate the American Indian and Alaskan Native Desk from the organization chart and realign its functions within the CCDO; and (7) eliminate the Office of the Police Corps and Law Enforcement Education from the organization chart and realign its remaining functions within the Bureau of Justice Assistance. These changes would be accomplished within existing budgetary and personnel resources.

Your signature on the chart will constitute approval of the reorganization. Your signature on the memorandum will advise the Assistant Attorney General of OJP of your approval. The Justice Management Division has determined that notification of the Office of Management and Budget and Congress is required.

The organization chart and memorandum are approved with respect to form and legality.

MEMORANDUM FOR ALBERTO R. GONZALES
Attorney General

Re: Proposed Reorganization of the Office of Justice Programs

ACTION MEMORANDUM

The attached proposed organization chart and memorandum were prepared by the Justice Management Division, and forwarded by the Acting Assistant Attorney General for Administration to this Office for review with respect to form and legality.

The proposal would establish a new organizational structure for the Office of Justice Programs (OJP) to improve operational and managerial efficiency and provide for enhanced accountability. These changes would be accomplished within existing budgetary and personnel resources.

Your signature on the chart will constitute approval of the reorganization. Your signature on the memorandum will advise the Assistant Attorney General of OJP of your approval. The Justice Management Division has determined that notification of the Office of Management and Budget and Congress is required.

The organization chart and memorandum are approved with respect to form and legality.

SUBJECT: Draft Specter Legislation

Very close hold. Please share with Pat Philbin and Peter Keisler. Specter is calling Jim Haynes on Monday. Please provide informal views by then.

Title: To provide comprehensive procedures for the adjudication of cases involving unprivileged combatants.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; AUTHORITY; FINDINGS.

(a) Short Title.—This Act may be cited as the "Unprivileged Combatant Act of 2005".

(b) Authority.—The requirements, conditions, and restrictions established by this Act are made under the authority of Congress under clauses 1, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 18 of article I, section 8 of the Constitution of the United States.

(c) Findings.—Congress finds the following:

(1) Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides that the Congress has the power to "constitute Tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; ... define and punish ... Offenses against the Law of Nations; ... make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water; ... make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof".

(2) The Supreme Court has repeatedly recognized military tribunals, as stated in Madsen v. Kinsella 343 U.S. 341, 1952, "[s]ince our nation's earliest days, such tribunals have been constitutionally recognized agencies for meeting many urgent governmental responsibilities related to war....They have taken many forms and borne many names. Neither their procedure nor their jurisdiction has been prescribed by statute. It has been adapted in each instance to the need that called it forth." Madsen, citing In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946).

(3) The President has inherent authority to convene military tribunals arising from his role as Commander and Chief of the Armed Forces under article II of the Constitution and from title 10 of the United States Code. Due to the extraordinary circumstances of the ongoing war on terrorism, it is appropriate for Congress to provide additional and explicit authorization of and procedures for military tribunals to adjudicate and punish offenses relating to the war on terrorism.

(4) This Act is in direct response to the United State Supreme Court's ruling in Rasul v. Bush. With the passage of this Act, the 109th Congress will have addressed the concerns of the Supreme Court's Rasul majority, and there will no longer be any need for further cause or legal challenge by or concerning these detained individuals, excepting as allowed for by this Act.

SEC. 2. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act, the following definitions apply:

(1) CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL.—The term "classification tribunal" means any tribunal conducted under section 9 or any related proceeding.

(2) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—The term "classified information" has the same meaning given that term in section 1(a) of the Classified Information Procedures Act (18 U.S.C. App.).

(3) DESIGNEE.—The term "designee" means a person who has been in the custody of the Department of Defense for not less than 180 consecutive days after the date of enactment of this Act and who has not been charged with a criminal offense during that period.

(4) DESTRUCTIVE DEVICE.—The term "destructive device" means—

(A) any explosive, incendiary, or poison gas—

(i) bomb;

(ii) grenade;

(iii) rocket;

(iv) missile;

(v) mine; or

(vi) device similar to any of the devices described in the preceding clauses; and

(B) any type of weapon that will expel a projectile by the action of an explosive or other propellant.

(5) JUDGE.—The term "Judge" shall refer to a United States military judge designated by the Secretary of Defense to hear cases under this Act.

(6) UNPRIVILEGED COMBATANT.—The term "unprivileged combatant" means an individual—

(A) who has been designated as an enemy combatant by a Combatant Status Review Tribunal prior to the enactment of this Act;

(B) who a Field Tribunal conducted by the United States military as provided in this Act determines—

(i) is not entitled to the protections set out in the Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, done at Geneva, August 12, 1948 (6 UST 3516) (referred to in this Act as the "Geneva Convention"); and

(ii) either—

(I) knowingly assists, conspires with, or solicits for a group or an individual hostile to the United States;

(II) knowingly attempts to assist others in taking up arms against the United States;

(III) conspires with or solicits others to take up arms against the United States; or

(IV) has taken up arms against, or intentionally assisted combat operations against, the United States.

(7) CRIMINAL PROSECUTION.—The term "criminal prosecution" means a prosecution for a violation of any criminal law, including subchapter X of chapter 47 of title 10, United States Code (the Uniform Code of Military Justice) or pursuant to the Department of Defenses Military Commission Instruction number two.

(8) FIREARM.—The term "firearm" has the same meaning given that term in section 921(a)(3) of title 18, United States Code.

(9) INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM.—The term "international terrorism" has the same meaning given that term in section 101(c) of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (50 U.S.C. 1801(c)).

(10) PROTECTED INFORMATION.—The term "protected information" means information—

(A) that is classified information;

(B) protected by law or rule from unauthorized disclosure;

(C) the disclosure of which may endanger the physical safety of participants in Commission proceedings, including prospective witnesses;

(D) concerning intelligence and law enforcement sources, methods, or activities; or

(E) the disclosure of which would otherwise jeopardize national security interests.

(11) UNITED STATES PERSON.—The term "United States person" has the same meaning given that term in section 101(i) of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978 (50 U.S.C. 1801(c)).

(12) WEAPON.—The term "weapon" means a club, knife, or similar object that is used to injure, defeat, or destroy.

SEC. 3. AUTHORIZING MILITARY COMMISSIONS.

The President is authorized to establish military commissions for the trial of individuals for offenses as provided in this Act.

SEC. 4. COMMISSION JURISDICTION.

(a) Unprivileged Combatants.—This Act establishes exclusive jurisdiction to hear any matter involving an unprivileged combatant who has been detained by the Department of Defense for not less than 180 consecutive days at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, or any other location not located within the theater of war, as defined by the Department of Defense.

(b) Offenses.—

(1) CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.—The Commission shall have jurisdiction to hear any criminal prosecution involving international terrorism, including any offense under chapter 113B of title 18, United States Code.

(2) OFFENSES AGAINST THE LAWS OF WAR.—The Commission shall have exclusive jurisdiction over violations of the laws of war committed by unprivileged combatants.

(3) OTHER OFFENSES.—The Commission shall have jurisdiction over other offenses traditionally triable by military commissions or pursuant to the Department of Defense's Military Commission Instruction number two.

SEC. 5. APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

(a) In General.—

(1) FINAL DECISIONS.—The Military Commission Review Panel designated by the Secretary of Defense shall have exclusive jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions of the Commission and other tribunals under this Act.

(2) INTERLOCUTORY APPEALS.—The Military Commission Review Panel shall have exclusive jurisdiction of appeals of the disapproval of a summary of classified information under section 10(d)(2)(C). Any appeal under this subsection shall be conducted as expeditiously as possible.

(b) Review by Supreme Court.—

(1) CERTIORARI.—The decisions of the Military Commission Review Panel are subject to review by the Supreme Court by writ of certiorari.

(2) EXEMPTION FROM CERTAIN PETITION REQUIREMENTS.—A person who files a petition for a writ of certiorari under paragraph (1) shall not be required to submit—

(A) prepayment of any fees and costs or security therefor; or

(B) the affidavit required by section 1915(a) of title 28, United States Code.

SEC. 6. THE COMMISSION.

(a) Commission Personnel.—

(1) MEMBERS.—

(A) APPOINTMENT.—The Secretary of Defense shall designate no less than 12 United States military judges to serve as members of the Commission and to assume other duties assigned in this Act.

(B) NUMBER OF MEMBERS.—Each Commission shall consist of at least 3 military officers, at least one of whom shall be a military judges.

(C) ALTERNATE MEMBERS.—For each such Commission, there shall also be one or two alternate members. The alternate member or members shall attend all sessions of the Commission. In case of incapacity, resignation, or removal of any member, an alternate member shall take the place of that member.

(D) QUALIFICATIONS.—Each member and alternate member of the Commission shall be a military officer.

(E) PRESIDING OFFICER.—

(i) IN GENERAL.—From among the members of the Commission, the Secretary of Defense shall designate a Presiding Officer who is a military judge to preside over the proceedings of that Commission.

(ii) DUTIES.—The duties of the Presiding Officer shall be as follows:

(I) The Presiding Officer shall admit or exclude evidence at trial in accordance with the rules of this Act. The Presiding Officer shall have authority to close proceedings or portions of proceedings in accordance with this Act or for any other reason necessary for the conduct of a full and fair trial.

(II) The Presiding Officer shall ensure that the discipline, dignity, and decorum of the proceedings are maintained, shall exercise control over the proceedings to ensure proper implementation of the President's Military Order and this Act, and shall have authority to act upon any contempt or breach of Commission rules and procedures. Any attorney authorized to appear before a Commission who is thereafter found not to satisfy the requirements for eligibility or who fails to comply with laws, rules, regulations, or other orders applicable to the Commission proceedings or any other individual who violates such laws, rules, regulations, or orders may be disciplined as the Presiding Officer deems appropriate, including revocation of eligibility to appear before that Commission. The Court may further revoke that attorney's or any other person's eligibility to appear before any other Commission convened under this Act.

(III) The Presiding Officer shall ensure the expeditious conduct of the trial. In no circumstance shall accommodation of counsel be allowed to delay proceedings unreasonably.

(IV) The Presiding Officer may certify interlocutory questions to the Military Commission Review Panel for the Armed Forces as the Presiding Officer deems appropriate.

(b) Powers of the Commission.—The Commission shall have the following powers:

(1) To summon witnesses to the trial and to require their attendance and testimony and to put questions to them.

(2) To require the production of documents and other evidentiary material.

(3) To administer oaths to witnesses.

(4) To appoint officers for the carrying out of any task designated by the Commission, including the power to have evidence taken on commission.

SEC. 7. PERSONS IN CUSTODY.

(a) Guantanamo Bay.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Not later than 60 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall file with the clerk of the Commission a complete listing of all persons who—

(A) are being detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay,

Cuba; and

(B) the Government wishes to continue to detain as an unprivileged combatant.

(2) UPDATED LIST.—The Secretary of Defense shall file an updated list of the persons identified under paragraph (1) with the clerk of the Commission at least once every 30 days after the date the list described in paragraph (1) was filed.

(b) Status of Non-Guantanamo Bay Detainees.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Not later than 6 months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall file with the clerk of the Commission a certification with respect to each designee, being found to be an unprivileged combatant under Section eight of this Act detained outside of the theater of war as defined by the Department of Defense, indicating—

(A) where the designee was captured;

(B) the basis for asserting the designee is an unprivileged combatant;

(C) whether it is the judgment of the Department of Defense that the national security of the United States, including the security of the Armed Forces of the United States and its allies, requires that the designee must continue to be detained; and

(D) whether the designee is a United States citizen and, if not, has any lawful immigration status under the immigration laws of the United States.

(2) NEW DESIGNEES.—For any designee taken into custody by the United States after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall file with the clerk of the Commission a certification providing the information required under paragraph (1) not later than 180 days after the date on which such designee is taken into custody so long as the detainee was found to be an unprivileged combatant under Section eight of this Act.

SEC. 8. FIELD TRIBUNALS.

(a) In General.—Not more than 30 days after a suspected unprivileged combatant has been detained by United States forces, the Department of Defense must conduct a field tribunal in order to determine whether the detainee is an unprivileged combatant and whether the detainee is entitled to the rights afforded under the Geneva Convention.

(b) Procedures.—The procedures governing these field tribunals shall be promulgated by the Department of Defense

SEC. 9. CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNALS.

(a) In General.—Any designee shall be released and repatriated to an appropriate country unless the classification tribunal finds by a preponderance of the evidence that—

(1)(A) the detainee is a threat to the national security interest of the United States; or

(B) there are reasonable grounds to believe that if released the person would take up arms against the United States;

(2) the detainee is not a privileged combatant entitled to provisions under the Geneva Convention; and

(3) the detainee is not a citizen of the United States of America.

(b) Appointment.—The classification tribunals shall be appointed by the Secretary of Defense and consist solely of line officers, one of whom shall be an attorney.

(c) Determination.—If the classification tribunal finds that a person meets the requirements of subsection (a), the Commission shall order that the designee shall continue to be detained by the Department of Defense, subject to periodic review under subsection (e). The time period for the detention of these detainees may not exceed the time period that United States forces are engaged in combat operations as defined by the Department of Defense in the nation or theater where a detainee was captured. At the conclusion of combat operations within a given theater or nation, all detainees that were captured in that area must be either indicted under this Act or repatriated to the appropriate country.

(d) Considerations.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—In making a determination under subsection (a), the classification tribunal shall consider any information brought to its attention regarding the need for continued detention, including—

(A) the designee's alleged position or rank in any hostile organization;

(B) the activities of that hostile organization;

(C) any statements made by the designee in response to interrogation; and

(D) the designee's history of violence or terrorist activity.

(2) PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE.—If the Government represents that a designee was captured during a military engagement while taking up arms against, or supporting military operations against, the Armed Forces of the United States or its allies, there shall be prima facie evidence that, if released, the designee would take up arms against the United States.

(e) Timing.—Any designee shall be afforded a classification tribunal as soon as is reasonably practicable. Said tribunal must be listed no later than 180 days after the designee's capture and must take place no later than 30 days after listing, unless continued.

(f) Periodic Review.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Administrative Review Board designated by the Department of Defense shall review an order authorizing the Government to continue to detain a person under subsection (b) annually to determine whether there are changed circumstances that warrant affording the person a new tribunal under subsection (a). Detainees apprehended during a military engagement while taking up arms against, or supporting military operations against, the Armed Forces of the United States or its allies may be detained until the cessation of armed hostilities in the nation or region in which they were captured.

(2) ARGUMENT.—The Government and the designee may be heard regarding the review under paragraph (1).

SEC. 10. CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNAL PROCEDURES.

(a) Designees.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The designee shall not be required to testify or present any evidence at a classification tribunal.

(2) PRESENCE.—The designee shall be entitled to be present at the classification tribunal.

(b) Counsel.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—A designee is entitled to the assistance of counsel admitted to practice under this Act at every stage of the classification tribunal, including the periodic review of orders under subsection (e).

(2) RIGHT TO APPOINTED COUNSEL.—A designee who is unable to obtain counsel is entitled to have counsel admitted to practice before the Commission.

(3) REFUSAL OF COUNSEL.—A designee may waive counsel.

(c) Discovery.—

(1) GOVERNMENT'S DISCLOSURE.—Not later than 3 days prior to the classification tribunal, the Government shall make available for inspection by counsel for the designee any affidavit or affirmation the Government intends to offer in support of continuing to detain the designee. The Commission shall maintain a copy of any submissions made by the Government for inspection by the designee and for transmittal, if necessary, to the Commission.

(2) DESIGNEE'S DISCLOSURE.—If the designee chooses to submit any evidence, such evidence, including a list of any witnesses the designee intends to call, shall be made available to the Government for inspection not later than 3 days prior to the classification tribunal.

(d) Evidence.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Rules of Evidence shall not apply to a classification tribunal.

(2) ADMISSIBILITY STANDARD.—Evidence shall be admitted if the Commission determines the evidence would have probative value to a reasonable person.

(3) AFFIDAVIT OR AFFIRMATION.—The Government may proceed by proffer and submit any relevant information by affidavit or affirmation, unless decided unreliable by the members of the tribunal.

(4) CROSS-EXAMINATION.—

(A) GOVERNMENT WITNESSES.—If the Government chooses to call witnesses, the designee may cross-examine those witnesses on all relevant facts.

(B) DESIGNEE WITNESSES.—If the designee calls any witnesses, they shall be subject to cross examination.

(C) DESIGNEE.—If the designee chooses to testify, the designee shall be subject to cross-examination.

(e) Defenses.—The designee may challenge whether the designee satisfies the elements required under subsection (a).

(f) Proceedings.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—All classification tribunals shall be closed to the public.

(2) SECURITY CLEARANCES.—Each person present at a classification tribunal, other than the designee, shall possess a security clearance appropriate to the level of any classified information being presented.

(3) PUBLIC INFORMATION REGARDING PROCEEDINGS.—After the Commission has ruled in the classification tribunal, the parties shall propose a nonclassified summary to the Commission. The Commission shall publicly release a summary, containing any information generated at the tribunal which can be disclosed in a manner consistent with the Classified Information Procedures Act (18 U.S.C. App.) and the national security of the United States.

(g) Reinstituting Classification Proceedings.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—If a matter involving the classification tribunal of a designee is dismissed without prejudice by the classification tribunal or withdrawn by the Government at, or prior to, the classification tribunal, the Government may reinstitute the matter with the tribunal that dismissed or permitted the withdrawal of the matter.

(2) TIME LIMIT.—A complaint reinstituting proceedings under paragraph (1) shall be filed not later than 10 days after the dismissal or withdrawal of the matter.

(3) NUMBER.—The Government may reinstitute proceedings under paragraph (1) not more than twice and only if approved by the ranking member on the Classification Tribunal.

SEC. 11. CONTINUANCE OF CLASSIFICATION TRIBUNALS.

(a) Continuances.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Commission may, for cause shown, grant a continuance of a classification tribunal.

(2) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—Upon motion of the Government, a classification tribunal shall grant a continuance under paragraph (1) if the Court determines the classification tribunal cannot proceed without an unacceptable disclosure of classified information or evidence. The tribunal shall review the purported classified information in compliance with This Act. If the Commission grants a continuance under this paragraph, the matter shall be continued until the sensitivity of the classified information or evidence is diminished or alternative evidence is developed.

(3) CONTINUANCE.—Upon motion of the Government, the tribunal may grant a continuance for as long as necessary, but no longer than one year, under paragraph (1) if the tribunal determines that the individual being detained is a high level individual in the planning or financing of terrorist activities or the individual possess information vital to the safety of the United States or its citizens.

(4) EX PARTE APPLICATIONS.—The Government may move for a continuance under paragraph (1) ex parte and a designee is not entitled to representation by counsel in connection with any such ex parte motion, nor shall the deisgnee be given notice of said request for a hearing prior to the Commission's ruling on the Government's request for a continuance pursuant to paragraph (3).

(b) Grant of Continuance.—For each continuance granted under subsection (a), the court shall note on the record of the proceedings—

(1) the grounds for granting each such continuance;

(2) the identity of the party requesting the continuance;

(3) the new date and time for the tribunal hearing; and

(4) the reasons that the date under paragraph (3) was chosen.

SEC. 12. CRIMINAL PROSECUTION PROCEDURES GENERALLY.

(a) Counsel.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—A defendant in a criminal proceeding under this Act has a right to be represented by counsel admitted to practice before the Commission under this Act.

(2) APPOINTED COUNSEL.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—A defendant who is unable to obtain counsel is entitled to have counsel appointed and to be represented by such counsel at every stage of the proceeding subsequent to being indicted.

(B) APPOINTMENT PROCEDURE.—The Secretary of Defense shall determine the rules for appointing counsel to practice before the Commission.

(b) Discovery.—

(1) CLASSIFIED DOCUMENTS AND OBJECTS.—

(A) SUMMARY OF CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—

(i) IN GENERAL.—If the Government intends to offer classified information as evidence before the Commission or tribunal, the Government shall submit a summary of the information to the Presiding Officer and the defendant.

(ii) REVIEW.—

(I) IN GENERAL.—A Presiding Officer shall review any summary submitted under clause (i) to determine if the summary provides the substantially the same information that the classified information would tend to prove.

(II) DISAPPROVAL.—If a Presiding Officer determines the summary does not satisfy the requirements of subclause (I), the Commission shall notify the Government and the defendant and return the summary to the Government with the notification.

(iii) REVISED SUMMARY.—If the Presiding Officer does not approve a summary under clause (ii), the Government may submit a revised summary of the classified information to the Commission and the defendant not later than 15 days after the date on which the prosecution receives the notification. A revised summary of classified information submitted under this clause shall be subject to review as provided under clause (ii).

(B) ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.—The Commission may admit and consider classified information offered by the prosecution if a summary of the information was submitted and approved under subparagraph (A). The Commission shall receive and consider the classified information ex parte and in camera.

(C) INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL.—

(i) IN GENERAL.—The Government may appeal any disapproval of a summary or revised summary of classified information.

(ii) TIMELINESS.—Any appeal under this subparagraph shall be commenced not later than 15 days after the date on which the Government receives the notification of disapproval from the judge under subparagraph (A)(ii)(II).

(iii) DOCUMENTATION.—If the Government files an appeal under this subparagraph, the filing by the Government shall include—

(I) the classified information;

(II) the summary and any revised summary of the classified information; and

(III) a summary of all other evidence intended to be offered by the Government.

(iv) ACTION BY COMMISSION.—The appellate court shall conduct a de novo review of the summary or summaries and issue a final ruling on the interlocutory appeal not later than 45 days after all submissions required by the Commission are filed.

(2) REGULATING DISCOVERY.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—The Commission may, for good cause, deny, restrict, or defer discovery or inspection, or grant other appropriate relief.

(B) EX PARTE REQUEST.—A party may make an ex parte request in writing that the Commission deny, restrict, or defer discovery or inspection under subparagraph (A). If the Commission grants a request under this subparagraph, the Commission shall preserve the entire text of the party's request under seal.

(C) FAILURE TO COMPLY.—If a party fails to comply with the rules of discovery applicable to the Commission, the court may—

(i) order that party to permit the discovery or inspection, specify its time, place, and manner, and prescribe other just terms and conditions; or

(ii) grant a continuance.

(c) Continuances.—In addition to any other basis for granting a continuance, upon motion of the Government, the Commission shall grant a continuance of a proceeding under section 3(c) if the Commission determines the trial cannot proceed without an unacceptable disclosure of classified information or evidence. If the Commission grants a continuance under this subsection, the matter shall be continued until the sensitivity of the classified information or evidence is diminished or alternative evidence is developed.

(d) Open Proceedings.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3), a proceeding before the Commission shall be open to the public.

(2) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—Upon motion by the Government, a proceeding before the Commission shall be closed to the public if necessary to avoid disclosure of classified information.

(3) OTHER BASES.—The Commission may order that a hearing be held, in whole or in part, in camera, if the Commission determines—

(A) it is appropriate for the security of a witness or a Government employee or to protect public safety; or

(B) that an open hearing would deter a witness from testifying freely or prevent the witness from testifying at all.

(4) EXTRAJUDICIAL STATEMENTS.—At the discretion of the Commission, the Commission may issue an order limiting extrajudicial statements by the parties.

(e) Protected Information.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Commission may issue protective orders as necessary to safeguard protected information in a proceeding before the Commission.

(2) NOTIFICATION.—As soon as practicable, a party shall notify the Commission of any intent to offer evidence including protected information .

(3) TRIAL RECORD.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—All exhibits admitted as evidence but containing protected information shall be sealed and annexed to the record of trial.

(B) PROTECTED INFORMATION NOT ADMITTED.—Any protected information not admitted as evidence, but reviewed by the Commission in camera and withheld from the defendant's counsel over objection shall be sealed and annexed to the record of the trial, with any associated motions and responses and any materials submitted in support thereof, as additional exhibits.

(f) Record of Trial.—

(1) REQUIREMENT FOR RECORD.—A record of each proceeding by the Commission shall be prepared promptly after the conclusion of the trial.

(2) VERBATIM TRANSCRIPT.—The record of trial shall include a verbatim written transcript of all sessions of the trial.

(3) EXHIBITS AND OTHER EVIDENCE.—The record of trial shall also include all exhibits and other real or demonstrative evidence, except that photographs may be substituted for any large written or graphic exhibits and any other real or demonstrative evidence. If a photograph is substituted for an exhibit or other evidence, the Government shall retain the original exhibit or other evidence, respectively, until no further appeal of the results of the trial is authorized.

(4) CLASSIFIED INFORMATION.—In the case of a conviction of a charge on which classified information is admitted as evidence by the Commission, the copy of the record of trial submitted to the Commission shall include the classified information.

SEC. 13. TRIAL PROCEDURES FOR UNPRIVILEGED COMBATANTS.

(a) Specialized Procedures.—

(1) STANDARD OF PROOF.—All three members of a Commission must agree that the defendant is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

(2) EVIDENCE.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subparagraphs (B) and (C), the Rules of Military Justice shall apply to proceedings under this subsection.

(B) STANDARD.—Evidence is admissible if the Commission determines that the evidence would have probative value to a reasonable person.

(C) CUSTODIAL STATEMENTS.—A statement made by a person who is not a United States person overseas is admissible, although the statement did not comply with the requirements for custodial statements under Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, and subsequent cases.

(3) FORM OF TRIAL.—Any trial under this subsection shall take place before two military officers or attorneys and at least one military judge.

(4) BAD ACTS.—Other bad acts may be considered if they would have fallen within the definition under this Act of either terrorism or terrorist activity and they are deemed to be relevant by the Commission including propensity.

(b) Custody.—The Department of Defense shall retain custody of any person determined by Commission to be unlawful combatants after the person has been either convicted or sentenced in accordance with this Act, unless the Department of Defense deems otherwise. Decisions made by a Commission in regards to a designee guilt or innocence may be considered by a tribunal when assessing the need to continue the detention of a designee.

SEC. 14. COMMUNICATION WITH PERSONS IN CUSTODY.

An individual detained, indicted, or convicted under this Act shall only be permitted to communicate with the interpreter assigned to the individual, the counsel representing the individual, prison personnel, and any other individual approved by the Secretary of Defense.

SEC. 15. COMMISSION COUNSEL.

(a) In General.—A person shall be admitted to practice before the Commission if the person—

(1) is a United States citizen;

(2) has been admitted to the practice of law in a State, district, territory, or possession of the United States, or before a Federal court;

(3) has not been sanctioned or otherwise the subject of disciplinary action by any court, bar, or other competent governmental authority for misconduct;

(4) is eligible for access to information classified at the level of "secret" as defined by the Department of Defense; and

(5) signs a written agreement to comply with all applicable regulations or instructions for counsel, including any rules of court for conduct during the course of proceedings.

(b) Consultation With Colleagues.—Any person admitted under subsection (a) shall not confer with any colleague who does not have the appropriate clearance.

(c) Security Clearance.—

(1) EXPEDITED CONSIDERATION.—The Secretary of Defense shall ensure that a person seeking to be admitted under subsection (a) is timely processed for the security clearance required for access to materials necessary for providing a defendant with effective assistance of counsel.

(2) COUNSEL INELIGIBLE FOR CLEARANCE.—If the Secretary of Defense determines a person is not eligible for the necessary security clearance, the person shall not be permitted to represent an individual in any proceeding before the Commission. The determination of the Secretary of Defense shall be final and is not subject to appeal to, or other review by, any court of the United States.

(d) Travel Expenses.—The Secretary of Defense shall reimburse any person not employed by the Government who is representing an individual before the Commission for travel away from the home or regular place of business of the person in connection with such representation. The rates for the payment of travel expenses under this subsection shall be those authorized for employees of agencies under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code.
